

TODAY AND FOREVER

By the same author :

THE CHILD WHO NEVER GREW AMERICAN ARGUMENT
HOW IT HAPPENS
TALK ABOUT RUSSIA
TELL THE PEOPLE
WHAT AMERICA MEANS TO ME
AMERICAN UNITY AND ASIA
OF MEN AND WOMEN
FIGHTING ANGEL
THE EXILE
MY SEVERAL WORLDS

THE CHINESE NOVEL (Nobel Prize Lecture)

THE HIDDEN FLOWER COME, MY BELOVED
GOD'S MEN
KINFOLK
PEONY FAR AND NEAR PAVILION OF WOMEN
PORTRAIT OF A MARRIAGE
THE PROMISE DRAGON SEED
TODAY AND FOREVER
OTHER GODS
THE PATRIOT
THE PROUD HEART
A HOUSE DIVIDED
THE MOTHER
THE FIRST WIFE and other stories
SONS
THE GOOD EARTH
EAST WIND: WEST WIND IMPERIAL WOMAN
THE BONDMAID

ALL MEN ARE BROTHERS (Translated from the Chinese)

JOHNNY JACK AND HIS BEGINNINGS
THE MAN WHO MADE CHINA
ONE BRIGHT DAY
THE BIG WAVE
YU LAN: FLYING BOY OF CHINA
THE DRAGON FISH
THE WATER-BUFFALO CHILDREN
THE CHINESE CHILDREN NEXT DOOR
STORIES FOR LITTLE CHILDREN

Pearl S. Buck

TODAY AND FOREVER

Stories of China

METHUEN & CO. LTD. LONDON

36 Essex Street, Strand, W.C.2

*First published in Great Britain by Macmillan & Co. Ltd. 1923.
Reprinted, February 1941*

Reprinted 1950

Reprinted 1956

3.2

CATALOGUE NO. 2105/U

PRINTED IN GREAT BRITAIN BY R. & R. CLARK LTD., EDINBURGH AND BOUND BY THE LEIGHTON-STRAKER BOOKBINDING CO. LTD.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

ACKNOWLEDGMENT is made to the editors of the following magazines in which certain of the stories in this book originally appeared: Asia, Collier's Weekly, Cosmopolitan, Ladies' Home Journal, Pictorial Review, Saturday Evening Post, This Week, Woman's Home Companion.

AUTHOR'S NOTE

SINCE I came home to America I have not ceased to follow China's changes and struggles with unending interest, sympathy, and implication, and from time to time this implication has expressed itself in stories. This volume contains a group of such stories, written during the past several years, some of them during the past few months.

The least extraordinary in incident are purely imaginative, if by that one means the absorption of facts until they are an atmosphere of truth. The most extraordinary incidents, such as those in "Tiger ! Tiger !" "Golden Flower," and "The Face of Buddha," are based upon true happenings, some of them told me by Chinese who have come to see me straight from the scenes of which I have written in this book.

I hope that the reader will feel as I do the continuity in these stories. It begins with the older Chinese and traces their increasing contact with this terrifying new age, and it goes on to the immediate moment of Japan's war upon China. If I have at all portrayed what I feel so deeply, the tough, resistant, indomitable quality of the Chinese people, then I have done what I wished to do.

P. S. B.

CONTENTS

| | PAGE |
|----------------------------------|------|
| THE LESSON | I |
| THE ANGEL | 25 |
| MR. BINNEY'S AFTERNOON | 41 |
| THE DANCE | 51 |
| SHANGHAI SCENE | 63 |
| HEARTS COME HOME | 70 |
| HIS OWN COUNTRY | 82 |
| TIGER ! TIGER ! | 120 |
| GOLDEN FLOWER | 189 |
| THE FACE OF BUDDHA | 216 |
| GUERRILLA MOTHER | 246 |
| A MAN'S FOES | 271 |
| THE OLD DEMON | 307 |

The Lesson

"I HATE to let Ru-lan go like this," said little Mrs. Stanley to her husband. "I don't believe she knows anything at all — she's not fit to be married."

She had just come in from the garden and her arms were full of roses, the swift-blooming, vivid roses of a Chinese May. Wyn Stanley looked at her, smiling, his heart caught in his throat at her loveliness. He and Mollie had been married five years but he never grew used to her. He saw her every day — how lucky it was that his work at the mission was to run the schools and not to be an itinerant evangelist ! If he had had to go off on long preaching tours as Dr. Martin did, and be weeks away from Mollie, he could not have borne it. Sometimes in the night he woke to trouble and shivering, fearful lest God call him to such work, lest something happen that he and Mollie might have to be separated — suppose one of the children were to fall ill and have to be taken home across the sea to America like the Burgess child, and Mrs. Burgess away for nearly two years, or — he would put out his hand to touch Mollie's round little body lying deeply and healthfully asleep beside him. He would not wake her — but somehow she always woke and somehow he always told her his fears, and then waited to hear her laugh her sweet contented laughter. "Oh, Wyn, as if—— Anyway, God hasn't called you to evangelistic work, has he? And if I had to go home you'd come too. We'd find another job. You suppose I'd let you stay here by yourself?" He was asleep before he knew it then.

TODAY AND FOREVER

Now he looked up at her from his desk, adoring her. She dimpled and put her hand on his cheek and pretended to pout. "You haven't heard a thing I've been saying. You never listen to me."

He caught her hand and held it to his lips, a little firm hand, scratched with rose thorns. "It's because I can't keep from looking at you. What's going to happen to me if I keep loving you more all the time?" He drew her to him and leaned his face against her breast. Under his cheek he could feel the steady pounding of her heart. "True heart — true heart——" he murmured to the rhythm of her heart. She bent over his dark head, pressing it against her. They both forgot the girl Ru-lan. They were swept back into the summer morning five years ago in the little old churchyard behind the red-brick church where her father had preached so many years, and where Wyn had come as substitute for a month of vacation. She and her mother had sent her father off for the trip to Palestine he had planned for a lifetime. What destiny it had been, that in the summer when the family did not all go away together Wyn had been the supply — just before he was to sail as a missionary to China !

They had fallen in love at once. The first moment she saw his tall young figure mounting the steps of the pulpit she knew him and loved him. And he, when he looked over the congregation, saw her and thereafter her only. And then in just a few weeks, that July morning after church, when she was running home to the manse by the short cut through the churchyard, he came striding after her, still with his surplice on. He had, he said, meant only to ask her to — to walk with him, perhaps, in the evening. But when she turned and looked at him, under the deep shadows of the old elms and hidden by the lilacs along the path, he had taken her into his arms and enfolded her. There was no question asked and no answer given, simply meeting. Whenever they came together it was the same thing, the same deep union again — like this.

THE LESSON

There was a small sound, and they jumped apart. The older missionaries always said, "The Chinese are not used to demonstration between the sexes." Mrs. Burgess had taken her aside very soon and said, "Try not to take your — Mr. Stanley's — hand in front of the Chinese, dear. It is — they would consider it indelicate." So she and Wyn had tried very hard to learn to wait until they were alone. But hand went so instinctively to hand, his arm was around her so naturally. Now they looked guiltily toward the door.

There she stood, Ru-lan, the girl she had come in to see Wyn about, the poor stupid girl. She was standing there in the doorway, dressed in a clean blue cotton coat and trousers, with a blue and white print handkerchief tied full of the books she never could learn. Her father had come for her to take her home to be married, and she was ready to go.

"Come in, Ru-lan," Mollie said. She smiled, her heart full of compassion. The girl's round placid face responded at once with a childlike pleasure. Above the large full cheeks her black eyes shone faintly. Mollie Stanley put down the roses and went over and took the girl's plump hand.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"I'm sorry you must go," she said in Chinese. "But your father will not consent to your staying longer. Sit down, child, and let me talk with you a little."

The girl sat down obediently, in silence. The smile had gone from her face now and she sat staring quietly at these two, observing all they did.

Mollie looked at her and was discouraged. She had so often in the schoolroom faced that dense placidity.

"Wyn, what shall we do?" she asked, turning to him. "She's seventeen and she's been here ever since we came, and I don't believe she will ever learn much. She's been through all the classes — Bible and arithmetic and hygiene — she reads a few hundred characters and that's all you can say. She just isn't fit for marriage — such a good, faithful, kind, stupid girl! You know she came up for baptism twice, and she just can't remember enough to answer Dr. Martin's questions, however hard I coach her. I'm sometimes afraid she's still heathen."

"No, I know," answered Wyn. "It's no good her staying here. If she had any promise at all I'd try to persuade her father to let her finish at least the grades. But I haven't the heart to let him think she ever could finish. Maybe she'd better go on and be married."

"Wyn Stanley!" his wife cried out at him, "as if it weren't serious that a girl like that is to be married and have a lot of children! Of course she will have a lot of children!"

They both looked, troubled, at Ru-lan, who, meeting their eyes, instantly broke into her great beaming smile, not understanding a word of their English. They were baffled by her smile.

THE LESSON

"Do you know whom you are going to marry, Ru-lan?" asked Mollie gently in Chinese. The girl shook her head. "It is a landowner's son," she answered simply. "My father is a landowner, too. The son of another village landlord, it is."

She seemed to put the matter aside and continued to watch them intently. Mollie Stanley sighed. She put down the roses on the desk and went over to the girl and sat down on a chair next to her and took her hand again. "Try to remember," she said, "some of the things you have been taught. Remember about keeping things clean and remember how dangerous the flies and mosquitoes are, especially to little children — and how little children should not be given cucumbers and green melons to eat, and — remember about your prayers, and about the kind Christ, who came to save our souls — remember all the things we have tried to teach about being clean and good."

"Yes, teacher," the girl replied. She was looking closely at Mollie Stanley's wedding ring. Now she asked suddenly, "Did the other teacher give you the ring?"

Mollie dropped the hand she was holding and turned to her husband. "Oh dear——" she said.

"Don't worry, dear," said Wyn instantly. "I can't bear that look in your eyes. You mustn't, mustn't try to bear on your dear self all the troubles of everyone else. We've done the best we can for this child. Now she must go home. Come——" He stood and took up the roses. "Here are your roses, darling. Run along now. I'll see that Ru-lan gets away. Where is her father? In the school hall? I'll go, then."

TODAY AND FOREVER

"No, but, Wyn, I can't go so lightly. Tell her — tell him we'll come to see her some time, anyway — Ru-lan" — she turned to the girl and changed her tongue quickly — "we shall come to see you some time — I'm coming to see if you remember everything — you must try — do not let yourself be like all the others who have never come to mission school."

"No, teacher," the girl said. She was staring at Wyn's hand resting unconsciously upon Mollie's shoulder, and he took it abruptly away.

Crossing the school lawn ahead of her, he thought to himself that Ru-lan was really a very tiresome girl. It was not only that she was so stupid, it was also that one could not be sure of what she was thinking. He would have said, for instance, that she was stolid and unfeeling; yet just now when she was about to follow him out of his study she had made one of her great broad smiles that seemed to enwrap him and Mollie, and she had taken Mollie's hand and held it, and had said with simple utter gratitude, "You have both taught me. Together you have taught me."

He remembered now how often they would find her staring at them in her silent persevering way, that time at supper, for instance, when he had sat holding Mollie's hand as he ate — they always sat side by side — and Ru-lan had come in with a note from one of the teachers. She always contrived, he did believe, now that he thought of it, to be the one to carry notes. He'd supposed it was because she was such a faithful sort of person that they had sent her. But perhaps it was because she wanted to come. There she had stood, staring at them with that silent beaming look — slightly feeble-minded, undoubtedly. He sighed. Well, it was sad when years went into teaching someone like that, someone who could never learn, when there were so many who could, and had no chance. But she had been there when he and Mollie came, and her father had come twice a year with her fees, and so she had stayed. There were not many fathers who paid full fees for a daughter.

THE LESSON

He entered the hall, and there the father was, a plain brown-faced countryman in a blue cotton gown cut a little too long and too broad for him, but of good stout home-woven stuff. He was not a poor man, it was evident, from his bearing. He rose politely as the white man entered.

"Sit down, please, Mr. Yang. Do not be polite," said Wyn, seating himself also. The girl stood a little to one side, waiting.

"This girl," said the father, nodding his head toward her, "I might have left her with you to become a teacher for you out of gratitude for all your efforts, but unfortunately she was early betrothed to the son of a friend whom I do not care to offend, and now the family demand the marriage. Otherwise I would give her to you to help you in your school."

"I thank you certainly," said Wyn. He wondered uncomfortably if in honesty he should tell the father that they could never have used Ru-lan as a teacher because she was too stupid. He thrust an apologetic thought toward God — it was difficult to be honest if it hurt someone else. Mr. Yang was obviously so proud of his daughter. He turned toward Wyn now saying, "She has had, you will remember, sir, eight years of schooling. It is not every man's son who has such a wife. But I have treated her as though she were to be my own daughter-in-law and to remain in my family. I value my friend as myself."

TODAY AND FOREVER

"It is very honourable of you," murmured Wyn. At least he would not tell lies and say he was sorry that Ru-lan must go. He waited in courteous silence until the father rose, briskly dusting cake-crumbs from his lap. "There — it is pleasant to sit drinking your tea and eating your cakes, but I have miles of country road to put beneath my beast's feet before night comes. Say good-bye, and give your gratitude to your teacher, Ru-lan."

"I thank you, teacher," murmured the girl. "I thank you for all I have learned."

They bowed to him together, father and daughter, and Wyn bowed, waiting at the door while they turned and bowed again.

He watched them while they went out of the compound gate. "I suppose," he thought a little sadly, "that measured by any standard it must be said that we have wasted the church's substance upon that girl. Mollie's hours and mine, too! I wonder why they do not seem so important as dollars in the mission budget? Anyway, all waste! She's not even a church member."

He walked back, a little discouraged. It was so difficult to know what was worth while in the work. One was conscientious, did each day what it seemed should be done, should be taught, and then realized suddenly, as he and Mollie had today, that no fruit was possible. He sighed a little grimly. Well, Ru-lan was gone.

In the village of Long Peace the people were all very well content. They had just finished three days of great feasting entirely at the Elder Liu's expense, since he was marrying his eldest son to Ru-lan, the daughter of his brother-friend Yang in the village of The Fighting Cocks. Everybody had eaten. First the tables were set for Mr. Liu's friends among the gentry, and the common people had waited their time, patiently and decently. Then the tables were set again and again, with pork and with fish, broiled with sugar and wine and vinegar, with beef and pork ground and stewed with cabbage and greens, with noodles and with sweet rice. In fact, nothing had been left undone, and everyone had drunk all the wine he could and had eaten far more than he could, and mothers had prudently tied into large blue and white handkerchiefs such titbits as they could not eat or force their children to eat at table. Servants had been tipped, gifts had been given, and firecrackers exploded in immense volleys. The bride, moreover, had been exhibited and commented upon, and though after all she seemed to be nothing extraordinary, no one liked the Elder Liu and Mr. Yang any the less for it.

THE LESSON

There had been a great deal of curiosity to see her, because everybody knew Mr. Yang had sent his eldest daughter to a foreign school for eight years, and anything might have happened. She might even have changed the colour of her eyes and hair, or the white women might have taught her how to bleach her skin, since it is well known the white people have magic. But she was nothing at all out of the ordinary. She was, in fact, a little more common than otherwise, a large lumpish girl with very plump round cheeks and small mild eyes. In addition her feet were large. Country wives nudged each other and whispered, "Look at her feet — big feet !” “ Yes, but the foreigners do not allow their pupils to bind their feet !” “ Ah, indeed ! How lucky that the Elder Yang betrothed her in babyhood and to his best friend’s son !” Young men glanced at the bride and made jokes concerning the width of her nose and the size of her mouth, and went home in high good-humour because they need not be envious of the Elder Liu’s son. Indeed, everybody was happy because for once the Elder Liu did not seem to be so very lucky, and one or two fathers whose daughters had been teasing to be allowed to go to a foreign school went home resolute for refusal. What — to waste eight years of fees and then have a daughter at the end who looked exactly as though she had never left the village ! So everyone was happy. They went home by moonlight the night of the third day, full of cheerful vilifying talk.

TODAY AND FOREVER

In the house of the Elder Liu, in the court belonging to his eldest son, Ru-lan sat upon the edge of the large nuptial bed, hung with pictures of babies and pomegranates and mandarin ducks and every lucky sign for marriage, and waited for her husband. She had enjoyed everything very much, so much that she often forgot to keep her eyes downcast as she should. But this did not greatly trouble her. She had remembered enough, she thought comfortably, and tonight they had given her a good dinner. The more tedious part of the wedding was over. She had now come to the part which was her own affair.

This was the time, she knew, when maidens should feel shy and uncomfortable and even afraid. She knew because as a very small girl in the women’s courts of her father’s house she had squatted on her heels listening as all the little girls did to the women’s talk. They listened while the women whispered loudly to each other, "I tell you, he was like a tiger — his great eyes——" "I tell you, nothing told is so terrible as——" "I tell you, I was like a chicken before a wolf——"

THE LESSON

They all enjoyed telling each other of this hour when their unknown bridegrooms first appeared. She thought now, staring reflectively through the old-fashioned veil of beads that hung over her face, that it was natural they should be afraid of marriage. What they had seen of the thing between men and women was not comfortable. But she had been to school for eight years with the foreigners. There was the difference. Not that the first years she had been there were of any use to her at all. She could not see much use, for instance, in reading books. In the first place books told nothing interesting. If they were about God, there was no understanding them — how could humans understand gods? She had listened politely to Mrs. Burgess and been glad when Mrs. Burgess had been compelled to go to America. For then the dear little Stanley teacher had come, that little pretty round-faced teacher, whose eyes were also brown so that one liked to look at her. The Stanley teacher had worked so hard to teach her that sometimes she almost felt she should try to learn something, to listen perhaps to what the Stanley teacher was saying, but when she did it had seemed not valuable.

No, she had learned nothing until that day when she had observed the man Stanley place his arms about the woman Stanley. At first she thought with consternation that these were two wicked and unmannered people. But they were not punished if they were. In rapid succession they had two small sons, both healthy, both dark-eyed. Evidently their

TODAY AND FOREVER

God was pleased with them. After that she had watched them many times. When they did not know it she had stolen in the night across the school campus, and had gazed steadily between the curtains of the room where they sat after the children were put to bed, and, watching them, had come to learn something from them. To this learning she applied her mind. So now she was not at all afraid. She waited peacefully for Yung-en, sitting at ease upon the bed, her hands folded in her red satin lap.

Everywhere through the courts quiet was descending after the noisy days of feasting. Children who had eaten too well ceased their crying and fell asleep, and servants yawned and barred the doors of courtyards and went to their own beds. Her own serving-woman was only waiting until the master came in to spread her pallet down across the door to sleep. When everyone was still, when the young men had all gone home, wearied at last with their baiting and teasing of the bridegroom, then through the silent empty courts he would come. She had stolen her glances at him and she was pleased with his looks. He was an honest sturdy young man, with a square dark face, not too smiling. He was shy, she could see, not quick to speak. A woman could live with such a man. She was not afraid, having learned so much about a man and a woman.

Then suddenly the door creaked upon its wooden hinges and there he was, still in his bright blue wedding robes. He did not speak, nor did he look at her at once. He came in and sat down beside the table and began to crack watermelon seeds. She rose and poured out a cup of tea for him and he nodded and she sat down again. She was not impatient. He could not go on cracking watermelon seeds all night. Outside the door she heard a loud yawn and soon a muffled snore. Her serving-woman was asleep. Now everyone slept except these two.

THE LESSON

She waited, smiling a little, watching him through the beads of her veil, but he did not look at her. She waited and at last she caught his eyes, stealing toward her. She answered instantly, frankly, smiling her beam of a smile. He stared at her and coughed and after a second of surprise he grew very red and made haste to return to his watermelon seeds. She suddenly perceived that he was afraid of her.

"And why are you afraid of me?" she asked, making her voice soft as she had heard the little Stanley teacher's voice soft.

He turned his head from hers. "I am so ignorant," he said at last in a low voice. "You have been away to a foreign school and I have always lived in this village. You will laugh at me."

She watched him. How now would the Stanley teacher speak if the man Stanley had spoken like this? Once the man Stanley had put his head down upon the woman's shoulder and for some trouble had wept as a little boy weeps, and the woman had not laughed. She had taken him into her arms and pressed his head down and murmured to him as a mother murmurs to a suffering child, and soon he was quieted. Ru-lan had not understood the woman Stanley's words, but the sounds she understood, and the way she understood. It had made the man Stanley feel strong again and cease his weeping.

She looked demurely down at her hands and spoke in a small plaintive voice. "I have to confess to you," she said, "although I was so long in that school I have remained ignorant. You cannot be as ignorant as I am. I do believe there are a thousand things you know I do not know. There I remained for eight years shut behind walls, but my brain is too stupid to learn from books. So I am very ignorant. I have everything to learn from you."

TODAY AND FOREVER

He gazed at her now, forgetting that she was his bride and that he was afraid of her. "Did you not learn to read?" he demanded.

"Only a very little," she replied.

"Did you read to the end of the Four Books?" he asked again.

"Alas, I never read any of the Four Books," she answered.

"Then what did you do in all that time?" he inquired, astonished.

"I sat on benches in schoolrooms," she replied humbly, "and there were those who talked to me, but I could not understand them, being stupid from birth. They told me of gods and of magic, and of small insects that cause disease if eaten, but then who eats insects? At least we do not. So I learned nothing."

"Nothing at all?" he asked severely.

"Nothing at all," she answered sadly.

He was silent, but now he looked at her quite easily and he had stopped cracking watermelon seeds. She could see the shyness leaving him as he thought over what she had told him.

"I only learned one thing," she said after a long time. Now she leaned forward and looked at him and he looked at her.

"What is that one thing?" he asked.

THE LESSON

"There was a white woman who was my teacher," she said, "and she was married to a white man, and they were very lucky, for one after the other they had two strong dark-eyed sons, and this when the other children of white people all have blue or green eyes. I learned from them something."

"What was the thing you learned?" he asked.
"Certainly two dark-eyed sons are very lucky."

"I learned," she said, considering, choosing some one thing among all she had learned, "that it is lucky when a man and his wife speak together freely and always with kind voices, as though they were friends speaking easily together, and not as they do in our houses, where it seems shameful so to speak."

"Do you mean speak together anywhere?"

"Yes, I mean that."

He gazed at her steadily. "What then?"

"And then it is lucky if the husband helps the wife if there is a thing to be done, such as to carry a basket or a bundle, if there is not a servant near."

"What does the wife do?" he asked, astonished.

"She also wishes to carry things, and so they try mutually to help each other."

"And who wins?" he asked.

"They share the thing," she replied simply.

She waited a little, thinking, remembering. . . .
Once she had seen the man Stanley lift his wife over a pool of mud in the road, and carry her through and set her down on the other side, one afternoon, when they thought none saw them. But before he set her down he had held her hard and placed his cheek against hers, and then they had gone on hand in hand until they saw her. But she had seen them long since. She had wanted to say, "Do not drop your hands apart. I know it is your pleasure to walk thus." But she had not spoken. . . .

TODAY AND FOREVER

"What else have you learned?" he asked.

"It is lucky," she said slowly, "for a man and his wife to clasp their hands together sometimes — it is not shameful."

He coughed and looked away and she went on quickly. "There are many things not shameful that we have thought shameful — they are lucky between man and wife. But I cannot speak them — they are things to be done rather than to be spoken."

He looked down and did not answer. He did not answer for quite a long time. Then he said a little gruffly, "Then do them — do what you have learned."

She rose slowly and went over to him. She knelt down on the floor before him as often she had seen the woman Stanley do. But she could not go on, although she knew quite well what came next. Next was to put her head down upon his knees and clasp her arms about his waist. But she could not do it. Now it was she who was shy. It had looked so easy when the woman Stanley did it.

"I cannot do it all at once," she faltered. "A little every day. But perhaps — at least take my hands."

He sat quite still and then he lifted her hands in his own. Something rushed between them through their hands, and suddenly her heart began to pound. Did the woman Stanley's heart pound like this also? What was the matter with her?

"What next did you learn?" he asked.

She could not answer. She drew their hands together and laid her head down upon their knotted hands. She should have asked the woman Stanley about this pounding heart.

THE LESSON

"Lift up your head," he said. How gentle his voice was, as gentle as the man Stanley's voice was ! "Lift up your head and let me take away your veil that I may see you."

She lifted up her head, and he drew his hands away and took off the headdress and the veil and set them on the table and then he looked at her. And then he went on speaking in that same gentle voice, "And did you learn it was lucky for a man to like very well the woman chosen for him?" He had taken her hands again. He was gazing at her, smiling, happy, as the man Stanley gazed at that woman who knelt to him. The man Stanley had also asked something of the woman in that strange tongue of theirs and she had answered. Oh, what was the answer to the gentle question? There must be an answer — she should have learned the answer. Then suddenly it came to her. It came to her, not out of her brain which was so slow and stupid and never quick to speak. It came from her pounding heart. "Yes, it is a lucky thing, I know, and the luck is perfect if the woman likes also very well the man to whom she is given."

She felt his cheek against hers, even as she had learned.

If Ru-lan had been able to write she would long ago have written to her teacher Stanley to ask her why, when she had said she would come to see her, she had not yet come, although it had been now nearly five years since Ru-lan had left the school. In the five years she had grown heavier, as what woman would not who had given birth to three large strong sons and now a small pretty daughter, so pretty that the child's father went against all nature and loved her twice as well, apparently, as even he loved his sons.

TODAY AND FOREVER

But then there was of course no man on the earth's surface like Yung-en. The man Stanley was never better to his wife than Yung-en was to Ru-lan. Bit by bit, through the five years, she had told him what she had seen those two white ones do, how they looked at each other, how they spoke, and with the telling new comprehension had come to them of what those looks and words meant. She was now sure that when those two spoke to each other in that strong soft fashion they said in their own tongue what came welling up from her own heart and Yung-en's. It was wonderful to think how alike were hearts. She knew this because it was so soon instinct to move freely with Yung-en, walking beside him freely, moving toward him freely and fully when they were alone. She knew that the women in the courts were often disapproving. She knew they said, "It is the boldness she learned in the foreign school — it is the freedom of the modern ways." She smiled, knowing there was a truth in what they said.

She pondered a good deal on her own ease. It did not occur to her, for instance, to share the anxiety of the other women lest their husbands take concubines. Did she not know Yung-en's heart? That was what she had learned, how to know his heart. They talked together sometimes about it, and how their life was different from those about them, and Yung-en said gratefully always, "If the man and woman Stanley should ever come to see us, there would not be enough I could do for them to thank them for what you learned from them. If you had not seen and learned, my life would not have been above any other man's. As it is, you have contented me so that all other women in the world might die and I should not know it." She smiled, knowing she had never been beautiful and now was less so than ever, if one should measure her by a beautiful woman. But she feared none of them.

THE LESSON

So when suddenly one August morning a letter came from the school she could hardly wait for Yung-en to come home to read it. She had long given up any pretence at reading. The characters she had once known had quite slipped out of her memory. If some woman asked her in curiosity sometimes what a character was on a bit of paper found, she laughed comfortably and said, "If once I knew, that once is long gone. I have so little use for letters these days." Or if her elder son, now beginning to learn, ran to ask her the meaning of a word, she would say, always laughing, "You must go ignorant if you ask learning of me, my son!"

She put the letter by until she heard Yung-en come and then she went to him and waited while he opened it, her hand upon his arm. After these five years it was more than ever necessary to her to put her hand upon his arm, and he moved toward her when he felt her touch, understanding.

"It is a letter from the man Stanley," he said after murmuring the letters aloud awhile. "They wish to open a chapel here in our village and preach their religion, and there will be also a school, and he is coming and with him the woman Stanley."

"Of course they would not be separated," she said gently.

"No," he said, folding the letter. He was planning rapidly. "We shall have them here in our own house. There is the south room upon the old peony terrace where I have my few books and where I never go. Prepare it with the best bed and with the blackwood furniture my father gave us from the south. And I shall invite guests — all my friends. I do not care to invite guests for the religion, but it is a way to repay these two if I show myself a friend. Now I can thank them for all they taught you."

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Yes," she said. "And we can show them our sons——"

"And we can send our daughter to their school," he cried, smiling. They sat down together in simple pleasure, holding each other's hands, laughing a little. "Everything is lucky in our life," he said.

"Everything," she echoed fervently.

So it was that on a certain morning in August, nearly at the end of summer, she welcomed those two. There they were at the door, standing together, a little thinner than she remembered them, a little grey in their hair. "You are tired," she cried, her heart rushing out to them. "Come in — rest and eat. Oh, how welcome you are !"

Yung-en gave up his work when they came and stayed at home, running hither and thither, himself carrying trays of sweetmeats and keeping plates full and pouring tea and going to see what quilts were rolled upon the bed and if the mosquito-net was properly drawn. "I can never do enough for them," he said to her in passing.

Well, there it was. The two Stanleys stayed three days and into the days Yung-en and Ru-lan heaped all that they had, all the years of their happy life together, all their luck in the three sons and the little girl. Ru-lan had meant to dress the children in their best, but then it was so hot that she let it go. It was better that they be comfortable. Besides, they were so beautiful and so healthy it must be a pleasure for anyone to see their little brown bodies bare to the waist. She had meant, too, to clean the house a little more, to wipe the dust from the table legs and from the gilt crevices of the family gods. But the summer days passed so quickly until the guests came, and once they were come there was no time for anything except urging them to eat, to talk, to rest themselves, to enjoy the huge feast and the lanterns hung to welcome them, to see the fireworks Yung-en bought and bade the servants fire for their amusement.

THE LESSON

She had planned to try to tell the dear teachers Stanley a little about her own life and how much she owed them. She had planned to say at least that she had been very happy. But there was no time for anything. They were busy about the new school, planning, working hard as they always did.

But they were still happy. She knew that. They still paused as they used to pause, to look at each other deeply. When they went away, so soon, so far too soon, she loved them more than ever. She stood beside Yung-en at the gate waving to them, crying to them to go slowly, to return quickly. And then when Yung-en shouted after them, "Our daughter shall be your first girl pupil!" her heart overflowed toward them and she cried after them, "Yes — teach her, for you taught me so much!" That was all she had the time to say. But she did not worry — they would understand. She went back into her house with Yung-en. His hand sought hers comfortably, and they sauntered across their courtyard, well content.

TODAY AND FOREVER

Rocking down the road in their rickety mission Ford, Mollie leaned back against Wyn, grateful to be alone again with him. Now, as always, when she sat beside Wyn she began to feel warm deep peace welling up in her. They were going home, they were together. They were going back to the children. She crept more closely to him, and he put his arm about her. He drove very expertly one-armed.

"Sweetheart!" he said gently. "It was wonderful of you to leave the children and make this trip with me. I shouldn't have blamed you, you know, if you hadn't."

"I can't be away from you, Wyn."

"No, I know." They fell into intimate, peaceful silence.

Over the Chinese landscape twilight was beginning to fall, creeping up in small mists from the ponds and the canals, darkening over the hills from the sky. From the thatched roofs the blue lines of smoke of fires kindled for the evening meal rose straightly into the still air. How strange, how different the scene was from the rough hills of her own home country, from the sharp angular American towns! And yet how little strange, how little different! These were homes, too, and these were people, living together in their families. And here was her home. Wherever Wyn was, was her home. She was instantly deeply content, content with everything, with everybody.

Then suddenly she thought of Ru-lan.

"Wyn!" she said.

"Yes?" he answered.

THE LESSON

"What did you really think of Ru-lan?"

"Well?" asked Wyn, twinkling at her a little.
"What did you really think?"

"It was just exactly as I was afraid it would be," she answered dolefully. "She's lost even the little she had. Wyn, you wouldn't have known, now would you honestly, that Ru-lan had ever been outside that village? Did you see the slightest difference between her house and any other ignorant village woman's house?"

"No," said Wyn thoughtfully. He guided the car skilfully between two deep wheelbarrow ruts.

Mollie stared mournfully over the landscape, the valleys tawny with ripening rice, the hills browning with ending summer, the willow-encircled villages. "No," she continued, "the house was dusty and not very clean, and the children were eating just anything. I saw that little girl chewing on a cucumber, skin and all."

"So did I," he said briefly.

"And Ru-lan is just like an amiable cow. She just sits and smiles and smiles. She doesn't read, she doesn't seem to do anything in the village, she's just an ordinary woman — after all those years away. I don't believe she does one thing different in her home for all the hours I tried to teach her."

"Mollie, did you see those idols?" Wyn said gravely.

"Yes," said Mollie reluctantly.

They rolled along in silence for a moment, remembering the row of gilt figures with the guttered candles before them. They had taught Ru-lan so patiently to say over and over again, "Thou shall have no other gods before Me. . . ." "Ru-lan, what are gods?" she used to ask. Ru-lan had smiled apologetically. "Teacher, tell me, for I do not know."

TODAY AND FOREVER

"They are idols, Ru-lan."

"Yes, teacher, it is what I thought."

"You must not worship them, Ru-lan."

"No, teacher."

And then when Dr. Martin had once asked her in the catechism class what God was, she had said, "Sir, God is an idol." Poor stupid Ru-lan! There was no telling how she would learn a thing. . . .

She thought over the three crowded days, days full of too much food and too much noise and many children and curious neighbours coming in and out to see the newcomers. But Ru-lan had not seemed to mind anything. She had sat tranquil in the midst of the confusion, smiling and smiling. And everybody had seemed fond of her — her children ran to her often, and the neighbours called to her cheerfully, and Yung-en. . . . She was struck now, remembering Yung-en.

"Wyn!" she said suddenly, looking up at him.

"Yes, darling?"

He turned and smiled down at her. There she was snuggled down by him like a kitten, looking not a day older. . . .

"There was one thing about Ru-lan — her husband really seemed to like her."

"I believe he does," he said slowly. "Yes — I don't know why exactly — she certainly doesn't remember anything we ever taught her!"

The Angel

THE old Chinese night watchman, standing at dawn by the gate of the mission compound in the midst of the crowd about him, said he had seen an angel in the starry night. He had not, he said gravely, been able to sleep for a long time afterwards. True, it was his business to stay awake all night and walk slowly about the brick walks of the school and about Miss Barry's little house, clacking his bamboo sticks together to warn away thieves who might be loitering there. This he had done very faithfully when he was young, but as he grew old he slept once or twice in the night, waking to clack the more assiduously, and then more and more often he slept. Now since last summer he frequently curled in a dark corner of Miss Barry's garden in her fern-bed, and slept very hard, only waking at dawn to clack tremendously and dutifully.

As for Miss Barry, she had wondered often what dog lay in her ferns and was regularly irritated that her ferns were being spoiled, so often irritated, in fact, that the old man, fearing her discovery of him, slept sometimes under a tree or elsewhere. But always he liked the soft ferns best, and he could not forbear creeping back there sometimes in the night when his bones ached, although always the next morning, when he heard Miss Barry's clear quick voice cry, once more discouraged, "Oh, who has let that dog in again?" he shook his head, smitten with secret guilt, but pretended ignorance lest he be discharged.

TODAY AND FOREVER

For Miss Barry was not to be counted upon. She might be endlessly patient, as she was, for instance, when cholera got into the compound and sixteen girls died in the school, and he nearly died as well and would have except that she came herself and injected the foreign medicine into his blood and saved him. Then as suddenly, quite without reason, she would lose all her patience over some small thing, a flower dried up for want of water, or dust upon her veranda steps. At these times he had even seen her lips tremble and tears come into her eyes, to his astonishment, and it seemed as though she suffered somehow a loss to herself.

Now on this day, he was wakened out of the fern-bed by the cry everywhere that Miss Barry had suddenly disappeared; and, rising dazedly, his spiky hair full of fern leaves, he was questioned as to whether or not he had seen her. But he had not, he said earnestly. He had only seen an angel. He had, he repeated over and over, seen it just before dawn on this moonless night just passed. But, as he told them all as they stood about him in the early sunlight, the men and women teachers of the school and the girl students, and even the two foreigners, Mr. and Mrs. Jones, the stars had been very bright, since it was autumn and beyond the time of the rains. Therefore he had been able to see the angel clearly. It had approached him noiselessly over the grass, its long hair floating and white, and it wore long loose robes and on its shoulders were misty tips of wings, almost hidden by the hair — fluffy tips like the woolly white shawl Miss Barry sometimes wore. . . .

THE ANGEL

How did he know it was an angel? When Mr. Jones, the missionary, asked this, the old night watchman stared at him indignantly. Had he not been an immersed Baptist for many years? He had gone clear under the water in the pool beneath the pulpit in the compound church on a very cold day fifteen years ago, when the water was supposed to be warmed and was not because the pastor preached too long a sermon and let the water get cold, and afterwards two out of the three of them who were immersed had caught cold and Miss Barry had said "they couldn't even baptize right." Naturally, the night watchman now said, "I know an angel when I see one, being so good a Christian as I am." Besides, he added in argument to Mr. Jones, had he not seen photographs of angels on the cards the Americans sent when they did not want them any more, and was there not an image of an angel set on top of the school Christmas tree every year? Of course he knew an angel when he saw it.

"And then," Mr. Jones asked abruptly, "what became of the angel?"

The old watchman rubbed his rough head thoughtfully and tried to remember. He had been waked out of a sound sleep, he remembered, by a cry.

"The angel screamed," he said.

"What did it scream?" asked Mr. Jones.

The old watchman tried to remember again. He was somewhat nervous under this direct questioning and afraid of making a mistake, which might be very disastrous, since Mr. Jones paid him his monthly salary of six dollars. He considered awhile and then decided that an angel would not only scream. It would scream something — some words. He decided to guess, piecing together his memories of mission Christmases.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"The angel said, 'Hallelujah, peace on earth,' " he replied bravely, his brown and wrinkled face apprehensive.

Mr. and Mrs. Jones looked at each other.

"How strange!" breathed Mrs. Jones. It was early in the morning and she had not combed her hair, and now in the sunshine she felt uneasy and tousled, the more because she was a large woman of fifty and her hair was scanty and wiry grey, and was always a trial to her, and because Mr. Jones noticed it so often and was critical of her about it. Now she endeavoured to look at him as though she were not conscious of her appearance in the present exigency. She had come as she was because the alarm had been given to Mrs. Jones first when Miss Barry's amah went to her room with early tea according to her habit, and found Miss Barry gone and the bed tossed in utter confusion. This in itself was strange, because Miss Barry was by nature the neatest of creatures; she rose every morning and laid her covers so exactly back that the bed looked scarcely slept in at all and was never any trouble to make, although even so the amah had to be careful, since Miss Barry was very particular. But this morning the amah had run straight to rouse Mrs. Jones, and two hours had passed and Miss Barry had not been found, nor had Mrs. Jones combed her hair.

Now Mrs. Jones turned to her husband. "I really think, my dear," she suggested, for hers was a nature which never did more, "that we had better go home and get things together and think over what we have heard and what the night watchman says, and I will just tidy myself a bit." These last words she added since she caught Mr. Jones's eye even now fixed in distaste upon her hair and there was no use in pretending.

THE ANGEL

But Mr. Jones would not at first take her suggestion. He never did, preferring to ignore it until it seemed to be the thing he would have done in any case.

"What did the angel do then?" he demanded of the watchman sternly. He was a small, precise man, a little younger than his wife, but seeming older because of his dictatorial look and manner. Now he fixed his dead grey eyes upon the old Chinese, profoundly distrusting this declaration of what the angel had said, distrusting, indeed, all this tale of an angel. After all, one believed in them, of course, as an orthodox Christian, but still . . .

The old man's face now cleared in relief. He knew quite well what had become of the angel. He had sat up in his ferny bed and stared after the white figure which had moved with great swiftmess over the lawn to the gate. He considered an instant. He would like, for the sake of his dramatic soul, to have said it spread white wings and flew over the gate into the eastern sky above. But he regarded with terror Mr. Jones's eyes, impenetrably disbelieving and grey as a fish's eyes. He decided hastily upon the truth.

"The angel went across the grass as though without walking, and then opened the gate, but without noise, and then went away," he said. And, suddenly realizing he was hungry and that the sun was high, he added firmly, "That is all I saw and all I know of the affair."

TODAY AND FOREVER

Mr. Jones, seeing this was true, was ready now to take his wife's suggestion. Together they went out of Miss Barry's exquisite little garden, blooming in this early autumn with chrysanthemums and late roses, into the bare schoolyard and then into their own rather barren court. Mrs. Jones found flowers a trial to care for, what with the long drought and equally long rains of the China climate, and Mr. Jones did not think of flowers or notice them. Occasionally Miss Barry had brought over a handful of tea roses or a stalk of lilies. Especially when she was invited to supper, she came bringing flowers in her hand, and watched a little anxiously while Mrs. Jones arranged them tightly in a glass.

"Oh, let me," she often cried out, and under Mrs. Jones's surprised eyes she pulled and loosened and arranged the flowers. "There!" she would say at last. "They hate being crowded."

"Well, I never," Mrs. Jones had said helplessly the other day. "Really, Miss Barry, one would think they were creatures!"

"So they are," Miss Barry had replied sharply — her temper grew on her, poor thing, as she got older. Then she added fearlessly in her somewhat downright way, "Besides, I like seeing a thing done right."

Mrs. Jones now thought of this remark as in a large, vague melancholy she followed her little husband up their steps. It was what Miss Barry said more and more often as she grew older — she was always wanting things done right. She would tidy a school-girl's black hair, loosing the braid to plait it again swiftly and strongly and tie it firmly at the end with a bit of cord.

"Learn to do your hair right," she admonished.

THE ANGEL

Or she would summon a servant sharply and point out dust in a corner. "If you sweep the room at all, do it right," she said sternly.

Scarcely a day passed, Mrs. Jones reflected, when she had not heard the phrase upon Miss Barry's lips. It had come to be almost an unconscious thing with her, a constant hovering upon the lips of her inner determined spirit. And last summer, when she was having the masons and carpenters repair the school, the phrase became really a mania with her. Mrs. Jones remembered meeting her one hot August morning, very damp heat it was, so that one felt quite dead and inert with it, and yet Miss Barry had looked as carefully dressed as ever in her white linen; and although her thin oval face was flushed a dark red, her white heavy hair was smooth and coiled neatly on top of her head. She was hurrying down the brick path from the school and talking to herself strangely and loudly when she met Mrs. Jones. Indeed she had not seemed to see Mrs. Jones at all, looking full at her but with completely blank eyes, while she cried out passionately, "I simply will not have it slipshod — it's got to be done right — done right — done right——"

Then suddenly perceiving Mrs. Jones she controlled herself, forcing a smile to her rather thin, delicate lips. "Oh, it's you, Mrs. Jones. I — I — do forgive me! I am afraid I have lost patience. These Chinese workmen — still, I try not to be unjust — Mrs. Jones, will you be so kind as to come and see what they have done even in the little while I was eating my breakfast? I can't leave them an instant without something going wrong."

And although Mrs. Jones had not wanted to go at all, she was unable to refuse the passionate demand of Miss Barry's dark and tragic eyes, and so she had lumbered after Miss Barry's thin quick figure, sighing a little because what she had to see was on the third floor of the school dormitory. They had picked their way among the bits of fallen plaster, and the gaping masons had stopped to stare and comment upon the white women and guffaw after they had passed. Miss Barry, hearing the coarse laughter, held her white head higher, and pressed her lips together more firmly, ignoring them. But her eyes glittered.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Look at that, if you please," she said at last, pointing at a wall. She had a delicate hand, fleshless, and always trembling a little now, but with beautiful shapely bones. Mrs. Jones followed its direction. At first she could perceive nothing but a lathed, plasterless wall.

"Look at these laths, Mrs. Jones," said Miss Barry. Why, actually there were tears in the woman's eyes! "Year after year the plaster falls from these laths because they are so closely and carelessly placed that the plaster can't get between. Have I not begged and besought and showed these masons what to do, and offered to pay double — anything, anything, to get it done right? This year I paid a carpenter to tear it all down. Look at them — he has torn the laths off and nailed them back just as they were! It's impossible for anybody in this whole race to do anything right. Until they learn, all the Christianity in the world won't save them!"

Mrs. Jones had been genuinely shocked at this. She suggested gently, "My dear Miss Barry! Really, such talk is very near to blasphemy."

"It is true," replied Miss Barry, her spare face setting into its habitual lines of tragic, repressed impatience.

THE ANGEL

That day, Mrs. Jones now remembered, Miss Barry had first mentioned the dog in the fern-bed, although afterwards she spoke of it often, always with increasing agitation. They had walked back to Miss Barry's home together, and on the way Miss Barry's darting glance had sprung about her garden. She spied a faded rose or two on the bushes and twisted them off swiftly and dexterously and tucked them into the loose earth underneath.

Then irritation had lit her face again. She was looking at the fern-bed, and quickly she walked to it. "I declare, that dog has been in here again," she said. "Look at these little new fronds all broken!" The irritation was gone. A tender sorrow had its place. Kneeling on the grass, she slipped her daintily pointed old fingers under the silvery curls of the broken fronds. "The poor little struggling things," she whispered, under her breath, forgetting Mrs. Jones. "As soon as they have courage and come up again, so lovely and so fragile, that beast gets in——" She rose to her feet energetically. "I must get hold of that watchman," she said. "He sleeps at night and doesn't remember to look for the dog — I know he sleeps — he's like them all — lazy and careless. You have to be after every one of them to get anything done right. . . ."

This morning in her own somewhat untidy sitting-room Mrs. Jones sank into an old wicker chair and breathed awhile and remembered these things about Miss Barry. She must go upstairs and do her hair, but just a minute's rest. . . . Well, of course Miss Barry had never known that it was the old watchman himself who slept in her ferns. Poor soul, it would probably have finished her if she had known that!

Later, at breakfast, seeing her slipshod Chinese manservant as he shuffled about the table, his bare feet thrust into the toes of his shoes, she was reminded again of Miss Barry. Only three nights ago she and Mr. Jones had been over there to supper. Miss Barry always had everything so nice. There were lace mats on the dark shining table and a bowl of pink roses in the middle of it. The servant was neat and white-robed and well trained. Miss Barry had expended endless effort on him. And now, although he knew perfectly what he was to do, her glance followed him as he served the cream soup, the chicken jelly, the lettuce, the smooth cylinder of vanilla ice-cream.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"She always wanted things too perfect," Mrs. Jones said suddenly, aware comfortably of the value of her own carelessness.

"Who?" said Mr. Jones.

"Miss Barry," replied Mrs. Jones.

"I wish I knew what to do next," said Mr. Jones, perturbed. He had been eating rapidly and in silence, thinking hard. "It's perfectly evident she got up out of her bed and wandered about in the garden and out of the gate. But she was such a rational creature — and had she anything to disturb her recently that you know about, Mollie?"

"No, nothing especially," said Mrs. Jones, reflecting. "You saw her at supper the other day — I haven't seen her since."

"I've sent runners out on the streets to inquire if anybody saw a foreign lady," said Mr. Jones. "And I've sent word to the magistrate's office. It's very embarrassing, I'm sure. I've never heard of such a thing happening before in the mission. If you are finished, let's go to her room. We may find a family letter or something which will explain. You are sure she has confided nothing of a personal nature to you recently or at any time?"

THE ANGEL

Mrs. Jones looked surprisedly at her husband. "Why, no, Elmer," she answered mildly. "You know she was the sort who never tells anybody anything. We've lived here next to her all these years and still I don't even know what family she has. I didn't talk with her easily. If we did talk, she was always full of something she was trying to do. She never rested. I think there is an older sister somewhere in Vermont, but I don't know. You know how she was — just putting her life into the school, and her garden the only pleasure she took. Why, she hasn't been away even in the summers for years. Last time I asked her if she didn't think she ought to go, she answered that if she did, she knew her garden would be ruined while she was away because the Chinese were so slack they'd never do a thing all summer, and she wasn't going to have all the time and energy she had put into her flowers thrown away as it was that one summer she wasn't here seven years ago. She's never been away from the mission since. She always acted about the flowers as though they were real creatures."

Mr. Jones said no more. He waited with obvious impatience while Mrs. Jones placidly finished her last slice of toast, her large face tranquilly mournful. Then he rose briskly. "Now," he said, "let's go to work. If we can't find her, I'll have to notify the American Consul at the port."

But when they had arrived in Miss Barry's sparsely furnished, neat room, they found nothing. There was the tossed bed, the linen sheets strangely crumpled. "She always had to have linen sheets," said Mrs. Jones sadly. "And such a time as she had getting them washed right ! She used to talk about it."

TODAY AND FOREVER

Mr. Jones opened the closet gingerly. It seemed improper to do so, for Miss Barry's garments, hung up neatly and straightly within, were startlingly like herself, and she was the last person into whose room one could consider a man's venturing. . . . Yet, Mr. Jones had thought sometimes, once she must have been beautiful. The shape of her face, the very slightly arched, delicate nose, the fine lines of the head, the dark, keen eyes, the white fine skin, and the masses of straight, smooth hair, white as long as he could remember—surely once she had been beautiful. But no one really knew her. She had lived alone here so long in the square mission house, vigilant, unsparing of them all, but most of herself, somehow always an exquisite New England spinster even in the midst of this sprawling, dirty, slipshod city, summoning all the dauntlessness of her forefathers to maintain herself against its overwhelming amorphous, careless life. Yes, staring at these garments, Mr. Jones saw her, always shiningly neat and clean, always embattled.

Then suddenly they found out everything about her. While Mr. Jones was staring at the gauntly hanging dresses, silver-grey poplin, white linen, a lavender silk for best, all with the neatest little collars and cuffs, his wife cried out, "Elmer, I believe there's a letter to her sister here—I found it under the blotting-pad on the desk——"

She held four carefully written sheets toward her husband. He took them and glanced at them, and then looked at his wife. "I suppose," he said nervously, "that under the circumstances we would be justified in reading it?" He could not somehow imagine reading casually Miss Barry's private letters.

THE ANGEL

"Well, how else are we going to know anything?" said Mrs. Jones, wondering at him.

So they sat down on the grey wicker couch and silently began to read the letter, Mr. Jones holding the pages, Mrs. Jones looking over his shoulder.

"Dear Sister Elizabeth," it began, "I hope you are fully recovered from your rheumatism. The climate in Vermont is conducive to this trouble. I trust you are taking every care of yourself. I sent you the usual amount by the last mail. Do not worry that I cannot spare this. I need very little for myself, and you are now all that is left me of my dear ones. I regularly give a little in charity, but find much given or given openly only works harm, as these people are naturally lazy and ready to receive indefinitely and so be spared effort, although I truly wish to be helpful to them."

Here the fine handwriting changed. It was as though Miss Barry had paused awhile and then taken up her pen again in agitation. "My dear sister Elizabeth, pray for me that I may have love in my heart toward these people for whom I have spent my life. For I am distressed to find, as I grow older, that I like them less and less. Indeed, I fear they are incorrigibly set in their idle ways. It may be, as my neighbour Mrs. Jones says, that their souls can be saved even though their bodies are unwashed and their minds and their hands idle. But to me God must be served aright, and He is better served, surely, in cleanliness and order——"

Here again there was a break, and the hue of the ink was fresh. The date was changed also.

"She wrote this last night," murmured Mrs. Jones. . . .

TODAY AND FOREVER

"I have not been able yet to finish this letter, my dear sister. The repairs on the school have been interminably slow due to slipshod careless work. I have not been able to endure it with patience, I fear. I have exhausted myself in repeated demands that paint be repainted because dirty fingermarks were left on it, bricks reset that were carelessly placed, and a thousand like things, which, seeming small, yet render life intolerable to a cultivated and sensitive person. I think tonight with an agony of loneliness of our dear childhood home in New England. I think there never was paint so white as on our house and fence. How did it keep so white? I remember the garden. Here in my tiny poor garden my life is a struggle against weeds, against dirty footsteps, even against incessant spittle upon my walks, for this is the distressing habit of casual persons here. Indeed, my life, which once I planned so nobly, has, now that I look back upon it, resolved itself into nothing but a battle against filth and laziness — and I have lost. I might as well have tried to stop the dirty muddy Yangtze River as it flows past this heathen city. Yet I have only a few more years left me and am too old at the battle now to give up. I shall go on trying — trying to get even a few small things done right."

Here there was the last break, here were the last few lines: "I must pause now, while it occurs to me, although I am undressed and ready for bed, to go and see if a stray dog is sleeping in my ferns. It has done so spasmodically all summer, to my great annoyance, each time crushing a dozen or more of the delicate fronds — oh, Elizabeth, I think I am not well! Something is wrong with me. I feel so often as though I would scream aloud like a child if I have once again to make one of these Chinese do a thing over right. I suppose I have begged the watchman hundreds of times to keep this dog out of my garden. I have struggled so long and he will not learn. Elizabeth, I will confess to you that secretly I have come to hate this people. May God forgive me — I cannot help it. They have killed me.”

THE ANGEL

Here Mr. and Mrs. Jones were interrupted by the old night watchman. His face was quite distorted with weeping and he cried out, beside himself, “O sir, O mistress, Miss Barry is found ! The men you sent out have returned — they say a few night vendors saw a white woman with long streaming white hair running down the street to the river, crying out as she went some foreign words. And we all went down to the river then, where the bank rises to a cliff, and we were afraid to look down except that a servant at the gate of the temple told us that near dawn he had seen a spirit pass, screaming as it went, and it ran straightway and leaped over the cliff, and he turned his face away and dared not follow. So we went. Sir, she essayed to leap into the river, but she failed. She only fell upon the rocks. There she lies, all white ! Oh, she was good — we all knew she was good, though she had a temper not to be loved. It was she I saw, sir — she appeared before me as an angel — I said I saw an angel — now I have seen an angel——” He turned and ran from the room, babbling and weeping.

Mr. and Mrs. Jones looked at each other silently. Then Mr. Jones coughed and spoke. “I must notify the Consul — and I had better keep this letter and send it to the relative,” he said solemnly, and, taking out a little notebook, he slipped the letter into its pages. Then he and Mrs. Jones tiptoed from the empty room. Upon the shining, dark, immaculate floor there were now their unconscious dusty footprints and the dustiest of them all were the prints of the old night watchman's bare feet.

TODAY AND FOREVER

Mr. Binney's Afternoon

IT WAS next to the last day of Mr. Binney's visit to Shanghai and he had left the most important thing until this afternoon to buy. This was a new cookstove. The cookstove he and Mary had brought to China with them twenty years before, and in which Mary had baked bread and pie and cake and sugar cookies for all the years they had lived in the dusty little Chinese town just south of the Great Wall, had suddenly refused to bake any longer and had collapsed. He should not perhaps have left so important a thing until nearly the last day, but he and Mary had decided they must not spend more than ten dollars on the stove, and when Mr. Binney had asked timorously at a large English shop about cookstoves the answer haughtily given had been of such an overwhelming amount that he could only leave in complete silence after murmuring "Thank you, sir" to the tall thin floor-walker dressed meticulously in formal morning clothes.

Mr. Binney had gone back to the Missionary Home where he was stopping, since he was a missionary, and there in his dingy small room he had made the subject a matter of prayer. The result was that the very first thing he saw this morning was a second-hand shop filled with every sort of goods, and in the midst of much else was a cookstove not too badly worn. He hastened in, and, after a little polite argument with the apathetic Chinese proprietor, he bought the stove for ten dollars. He had known he would, but the sense of exhilaration he always felt after answered prayers sent him happily down the street. One never could be sure if what one asked was in accord with God's will. When, as in this case, it proved to be so, it was very pleasant. He arranged with a ricksha man to deliver the stove and then turned delightedly to thinking of how pleased Mary would be.

TODAY AND FOREVER

For the cookstove was something he had planned especially for his wife Mary, his dear Mary, as a sort of present for their twentieth anniversary. This day fortnight he would be home with her again in their little four-roomed Chinese house under the Wall, and she would be unpacking the box he had brought — first the cookstove, with which she would be so pleased, then a few spices, some tracts and a little hand printing press to print more, some cotton stockings for her and warm underwear for them both, and the lengths of strong plain woollen stuff she would make into a suit for him and a dress for herself. It was not pretty material. Even as he bought it at a Chinese cloth shop he realized it would not be pretty ; plain dark grey cloth it was, but strong and cheap, and so he took it. They had so little money that one must think of strength and cheapness first.

Left to himself he might never have thought of anything else, except that he had learned by now that Mary loved pretty things. She was, for instance, always coaxing along little stunted flowers in pots and boxes. He remembered once her joy over a bit of red geranium someone passing through had brought her from Peking. But it had died. The bitter sandy winds out of the desert had killed it, as they killed everything. Those same winds had made Mary's rosy face pale and lined, and her curly dark hair grey and dry. Sometimes she looked almost as dust-coloured as the Chinese women. His heart ached suddenly as he thought of her. She had been very pink and white as a girl, he remembered.

MR. BINNEY'S AFTERNOON

He thought of this especially at this moment, for he had been wandering as his feet led him among the streets, and suddenly he came upon a beautiful gay street. "It is so pretty, Mary would like it," he thought to himself, looking about him. It was a street of hospitable houses whose doors were open, and from one door and then another he saw ladies come out, prettily dressed, and step into carriages which seemed waiting for them, and then drive smartly off, their Chinese coachmen brilliant in uniforms of red and blue, and tasselled hats. He stopped and stared as one of the carriages passed him. Two ladies in it threw him the gayest of smiles. He smiled back, surprised, and tipped his hat. It was very friendly of them, he thought. Perhaps they took him for someone else. But when he looked and saw another carriage pass and caught another smile as brilliant, he said to himself, "It is only that they are charming and kindly ladies," and he was grateful to them, for no one else in the city had smiled at him.

Somehow when they had passed him and he had trudged away, the other streets seemed less cheerful than they had been. In fact, he thought, that one street was the only really cheerful one he had seen. He began to walk slowly to the Missionary Home.

TODAY AND FOREVER

When he opened the door, the place seemed suddenly unutterably dreary. Yet it was quite as it had been when he left it after his tiffin. The unframed texts in the hall, the strips of matting upon the worn floors, the unpainted wicker furniture, were all as they had been. He went slowly upstairs, stepping aside once to allow Mrs. Browntree, the housekeeper, to pass by. He looked at her as she passed. She was not changed, he knew. He had sat next her at meals for nearly a week, and he knew very well by now her mouse-brown hair and her faded hazel eyes and her protruding front teeth which were stopped with silver fillings.

Seeing him she paused and said in her usual worried manner, "Oh, Brother Binney, will you take prayers tomorrow morning? Everybody seems so busy——"

Quite to his own surprise Mr. Binney heard himself saying, "I'm sorry, Mrs. Browntree, I am leaving early."

This, he realized when she sighed and went on, was practically a lie. His boat did not leave until noon. He went upstairs very gravely indeed. To lead prayers he had always regarded as a duty and an opportunity. One never knew what listening soul — why did he suddenly dislike Mrs. Browntree so very much that he had lied to her? She was a worthy woman, widow to a fellow missionary whom he had thoroughly respected. He should think of this instead of remembering that her black dress hung on her in slack rusty folds, and that there were spots on its front, and that her teeth were stopped with silver fillings.

He did not know what was the matter with him. He entered his room. He was, he thought, tired.

MR. BINNEY'S AFTERNOON

He lay down upon the narrow iron bed and drew a cotton blanket over his knees. He would rest a little while and then spend a time in prayer, asking God to forgive him and keep him steadfast. But instead he let the moments pass and he remembered again and again the beautiful ladies. They were, he thought, like angels. Their dresses were bright. He could not remember the colours, but they had all been so bright, such happy colours. And their faces were rosy, and their smiles so free and kind. He began to think suddenly of Mary's smile. It was kind, too, very kind, but not radiant. No one could call Mary radiant, although he now remembered, she had in her youth been merry at times, too. But this had passed. Hers had been, he now perceived for the first time, rather too hard a life for merriment, although he felt he had done the best he could. And, of course, when he had felt his "call," after he was graduated from the seminary in the little Ohio town where he had lived until then, Mary had been perfectly willing to come to the foreign field with him. Certainly he had not compelled her, although if she had not been willing, as he told her, he would have felt he must proceed without her, since it did not occur to him to go against his "call."

But he was sincerely glad Mary had felt as earnestly as he did about the Work. In the twenty years they had lived together she had been a comfort to him, although she had borne him no children. This in itself was of not such great importance, since he was aware that children would have brought problems. There was, for instance, no doctor nearer than three days away by camel. The chief inconvenience he had felt, in fact, in regard to her childlessness, was when sceptical heathen had asked too cleverly, "And if this foreign God of yours is all you say, why do you not ask him for a son, seeing you have none?"

TODAY AND FOREVER

To this one could hardly answer that such prayer had been made and refused. Indeed he knew, when Mary had at times abstained from food and had stayed in her bedroom, that she made this prayer with fasting and weeping, for once he had stood outside her door and before he could enter he had heard her voice cry out in an agony he had not heard before, nor dreamed possible in her, "Oh, God, if you would just give me a little baby — dear God, just one! — I am sure I could be happier — and I would be a better woman — I promise, I promise!"

He had not gone in, after all. He crept away astonished and miserable. He had not known her unhappy; indeed, she was even-tempered and cheerful by nature. And how could she be better? When she came down to supper, rather pale, he said nothing, since they had never been emotional with each other. . . . Now, remembering the cry, he felt a slight sense of hostility against God, who had not answered. Every dusty slatternly Chinese woman in the town had many babies, and only his Mary had none.

He longed passionately for the first time to make it up to her. Ah, how good she had been all these years! She had kept his home as comfortable and as clean as any home in Ohio, and somehow she managed to make the things he liked to eat, cinnamon rolls and sugar cookies and pies. . . .

But, now he decided, her life had been too dull. A woman needed romance. He thought again, very gravely, of the beautiful ladies he had seen, and of their lovely bright smiles. They had, doubtless, romantic lives of ease and pleasure. Mary's life had, of course, been very different. In the Chinese town they had lived quite as much without romance as they might have lived in a little Ohio town. They had soon grown accustomed to seeing yellow faces instead of white, and camels and donkey caravans and sedan chairs became as everyday to them as horses and buggies once had been. He preached daily in the little whitewashed chapel, and taught the scanty, curious listeners a hymn tune or two, bearing patiently their loud laughter at the strange foreign music. And since he was not very good at carrying tunes, Mary played the little folding organ and after the service went to see mothers and told them what to do for their sick babies and grieved when they did nothing, and wept more than the mothers did when the babies died.

MR. BINNEY'S AFTERNOON

Certainly neither of them dreamed of romance, not even when Mr. Binney was nearly captured by bandits and only escaped by pretending he was insane, nor even when a mob threatened to kill them because it had not rained for nearly a year, and the town gods must be angry because of the two foreigners. In this case Mr. Binney, after prayer and a long look at the clouds, had averted death by promising the rain that fortunately fell the next day, although one could not be sure of God's will, and they had been ready to die if rain did not come, and had sat waiting hand in hand.

Now, remembering these and other things in their life, he cried out in his heart again, "She has had it too hard. I must make it up to her."

And then it occurred to him to buy her a real present, something lovely and for herself, not a common gift such as the egg-beater of which she had spoken, nor a package of safety pins, nor a box of pencils. As for the cookstove, he would not count it at all, he suddenly determined recklessly. No, he thought in excitement, the next morning before he started he would buy Mary a pretty dress, a really bright, pretty dress. He saw her clothed as the lovely ladies had been, fashionably, with a little hat the colour of the dress — perhaps pink. One of those ladies had been dressed entirely in pink. Pink was pretty on a lady.

TODAY AND FOREVER

The supper bell rang shrilly. He rose, relieved, excited. He would buy the dress. He could see Mary unfolding it, her eyes suddenly soft above the colour, as they always softened before beauty. He was not quick to see things, and sometimes the softening of her eyes first made him know there was something to be seen, or he would not have known it — a flower, perhaps, or new green leaves or something which seemed special to her. His heart melted in him, and flew to her defence. In the new dress she would look as lovely as any lady. How he loved her !

He went downstairs almost gaily and took his place beside Mrs. Browntree, and bowed his head for grace. But he could not keep still. It occurred to him now that he knew nothing of where to buy ladies' garments and he must ask where he could find the dress he wanted for Mary, one exactly like the pink one. He would ask Mrs. Browntree tentatively about ladies' dresses.

"I want to take my dear wife a present, Mrs. Browntree," he began eagerly. "Next month we will have been married twenty years. I thought of a dress——" His rather ordinary hazel eyes began suddenly to shine. "I know just what I want. This afternoon I saw some very nice-looking ladies, Mrs. Browntree. In fact, the street I happened to be in seemed full of them. They were really very pretty, and they were evidently going for a drive, a number of them together. One of them had a very pretty pink dress. I thought of my wife——"

MR. BINNEY'S AFTERNOON

Mrs. Browntree, who was ordinarily abstracted in the service of the table, now stopped her ladling of the pale soup, and stared at him suspiciously. "What street was it?" she asked in a whisper, glancing at the other guests.

"I forget," said Mr. Binney, surprised. "Now I think of it, I believe it was Yinching Road."

Mrs. Browntree set her lips against her protruding teeth. She stared at him hard and, holding the ladle suspended, she leaned across the soup tureen to whisper to him, shocked to the soul, as he could see by her perturbed face, "Pretty women, Mr. Binney?" she said. "In the street of—of—prostitutes?"

Mr. Binney stared back, and Mrs. Browntree decently averted her eyes, for after all, he was a man. But Mr. Binney answered nothing at all. He bent his head over his soup and ate it spoonful by spoonful methodically. For a moment he also was overwhelmed at what Mrs. Browntree had said. Those — those creatures of whom one had heard — against whom the Bible warned all men — he had stood gazing at them, taking pleasure in their smiles! For a moment he felt a little faintness within him. . . .

But suddenly, to his own astonishment, he recovered. He glanced at Mrs. Browntree's set lips, from which her two front teeth protruded and he disliked her intensely. He disliked her drab hair and her faded black cotton dress and the grey pebble brooch she wore at her throat. Above all he disliked the righteousness of her whole bearing, although he knew he ought to be glad she was a righteous woman, and all this dislike drove him to a boldness he had not known was in him. It was still true, he thought, in spite of — of everything, that the ladies — those women — had been beautiful and their smiles kind, and he did not believe that necessarily every smile meant — meant . . . Anyway, Mary should have as pretty a dress as any of them ! She, as good as gold, should at least have as pretty a dress as — as a prostitute !

TODAY AND FOREVER

He wished he could tell Mrs. Browntree that merely to be pretty was not sinful — not at all sinful. When Mary was young she was very pretty. But how could he tell her, and how make her understand ? He lifted his head and looked about him belligerently, searching for speech. But he felt quite helpless. Mrs. Browntree's righteousness was as vast as Gibraltar.

Then God helped him. At his movement someone asked conversationally, " Did you have a pleasant afternoon, Brother Binney ? "

" I did," he replied distinctly and slowly. He stared solemnly at Mrs. Browntree. " I had a perfectly lovely afternoon ! "

The Dance

OLD Mrs. Ling sat with her back against the wall in the brilliantly lit dance hall of the French Concession in Shanghai. She sat immobile, dignified in her long robe of silvery satin, beautiful hands folded quietly in her lap. She was the figure of serenity and tranquillity. Nothing about her moved or was agitated. In the course of three hours no one had come to speak to her, but she had smiled occasionally with complete correctness and then resumed her tranquillity. Nothing of her seemed to move. Yet, if anyone had observed her closely, he would have seen that her eyes were moving. They were moving constantly, back and forth, up and down the dance floor, her following gaze threading in and out among the dancers. People of every race and nationality were about her, but she saw only one of them. Her eyes were fastened faithfully and anxiously upon an elderly rather stout man in a long dull-blue silk robe. He was short and most of his partners were taller than he. But it seemed to make no difference to him who these partners were. He grasped them to him with equal fervour, impeded only by the rotundity of his own figure. Upon his round smooth face had sat now for three hours the same happy, slightly silly smile.

TODAY AND FOREVER

When certain of her women friends had come to Mrs. Ling in the quietude of her own courts in the native quarter of Shanghai, and had told her that her husband was making a fool of himself, she had not at first thought it serious. Her husband was middle-aged, and she knew from hours of languid talk among the women of the household that at middle age women must expect their husbands to behave with an unseemly skittishness for a short time. If a wife could be patient he would recover without consequences, especially if she ignored a temporary outside establishment. It would only be a short while, because respectable men, men like her husband, always came to their senses very soon and realized that their years were their years and that they had sons and grandsons watching them and snickering up their long sleeves, and this brought health to their souls. There is nothing so restraining upon age as the ridicule of the young. Dignity is all that the old have left, and if they lose it they have no weapon at all against the young. The worst that could happen would be a young concubine, too young for the rest of the household and therefore inconvenient. When her husband prolonged his night absences she sighed and resigned herself to the thought of a concubine, hoping only that it would be a nice simple ignorant girl and not one of these modern educated hussies.

It was at this time that her friends called upon her, five of them. When they had drunk tea and eaten small cakes and played mahjong five or six hours, she perceived they had come with a purpose, and that they had something upon their minds. So she invited them to dinner, and when all the maidens and unmarried daughters of the household were gone to bed, and there remained only her three sisters-in-law and an aunt and a few elderly cousins and some of the old women servants, they sat in privacy, and she discovered what was wrong. Her husband was not behaving in the usual proper and permissible way of middle-aged men. He was not going to the good old-fashioned sing-song houses, nor was he paying court to some respectable established courtesan nor setting up a temporary apartment for some hired lady until his fever was over. No, the worst had happened. He had fallen a prey to the lowest possible form of vice. He was going to the dancing halls in the foreign concession, where went only modern women, white women, Chinese women, Russian and French women, all dangerous because they were modern and had as their aim the breaking of stable and old-fashioned homes.

THE DANCE

When Mrs. Ling heard this, she looked from one to the other of the faces about her. They were all pitying and sympathetic, and none blamed her. They all knew that she had been the best of wives. She had been a very general in her management of the immense household ; the slaves and servants were all contented ; her daughters-in-law were devoted to her ; and her husband respected her and never reproached her, since she had had five sons and none of them dead. By some stroke of extraordinary fortune the three children she had lost were all girls. She had nothing for which to blame herself. Yet this had fallen upon her !

At first she would not believe it. She said stoutly, sucking at her brass water-pipe, " I do not believe it. He would have said something. He is as talkative as a child, and if he had been wandering about in strange places and seeing strange things it would have leaked out of him. A woman he might have kept silent about, but not strange foreign sights."

TODAY AND FOREVER

Then of course there had been nothing to do except to tell her the truth. Old Mrs. Wu got out her large handkerchief and touched the corners of her eyes carefully and said, "The third son of my second son is a wild youth, and we are in misery about him. On the thirteenth day of this month he went to a place kept by a Russian for this dancing. He could not believe his eyes, but he saw the form of Mr. Ling there, walking about in this way they call dancing, and with a woman in his arms."

"What colour of a woman?" asked Mrs. Ling.

"I dared not ask," said Mrs. Wu gravely, "but in these times it might have been any colour."

Then Mrs. Li took her turn and said, "Two days ago in the evening, about midnight, at the foreign pleasure hall on the largest street in the French Concession, a place kept by a Frenchman for public dancing, the husband of a friend of mine, who is also ill with Mr. Ling's present sickness, saw Mr. Ling with a lady, undoubtedly foreign — since her hair was as red as a barbarian's beard — clasped against his own person, and he was also walking about with her. My friend's husband laughed a great deal about it and he made remarks of great disrespect to his wife about Mr. Ling, since he said the foreign lady was tall and Mr. Ling's face reached only to her bosom. It was a very peculiar thing to see."

At this the ladies all fell silent and looked delicately away from Mrs. Ling, and there were a great many sighs about the room. Mrs. Ling thanked them all and remarked that she thought the next day there would be rain. Very soon thereafter her friends took their leave, having accomplished the thing for which they had come.

THE DANCE

But of course, although her relatives pressed their attentions upon her and although at their insistence she smoked a small pill of opium to make her sleep, she did not sleep. She lay awake for many hours, and when Mr. Ling came in very late and somewhat drunk she did not reproach him. She waited until he was asleep and then she leaned over him and smelled of him keenly. He did smell foreign. There was a foreign odour about him, an odour of a scent she did not know. So she knew it was all true.

This was how it came about that she herself now sat in this garish, noisy, enormous room. She had lain awake until dawn planning what she must do. When the next night came and Mr. Ling put on his best robes and oiled the ring of hair about his baldness and smoothed down his few whiskers and said, "I go to play with a few friends," she answered calmly, "I hear you have been enjoying the foreign city. I have been wanting to go for a long time and see it. Take me with you."

He was horrified, so horrified that his eyebrows flew upright and his mouth drew down and his eyes goggled at her. "My dear," he said, "you would not like it."

"Why?" she asked. "Are there no women there? If there are no women I beg your pardon."

He stared at her, reflecting, and she knew him well enough to know that he was trying to decide if it were safe to lie to her. So she said innocently, "I hear in the foreign city that the men and women play together like little children." Then he knew that he had better not lie, so he coughed and pretended to laugh and said, "By all means, come with me. I am delighted."

TODAY AND FOREVER

So she climbed into their big motor-car beside him, and they sat immobile and intensely respectable behind their liveried chauffeur. When they reached the dance hall she followed him through the door, and sat down in the seat he called to have placed for her. She looked about her. There were no other women there of her own age. All the other women, and there seemed to be hundreds, were young, young and pretty, and looking strangely alike, in spite of the fact that they were of every race and their garb was very different. But they all contrived to have the same look, a look too painted, too eager, too pretty, too petulant, too greedy. She instantly disliked them all. But she only said to her husband, smiling pleasantly, "Go and find your friends. I shall sit here and drink tea and watch you. It will be a pleasure to me."

So he had departed, a naïve and dubious look on his moony face.

At first when he danced he had done so very decorously, stepping about slowly, his partner held at the length of his short arms. He had glanced frequently at his wife, and once he had come to her and said, "You understand this is a beneficial form of exercise. It is recommended for those who grow too fat as I have."

She concealed her horror behind her smile and said sweetly, "I can see it is very good exercise. Pray continue. It amuses me."

Plainly he did not know what to make of her, so he went away and drank heavily alone during a dance or two. Then he forgot her. Thereafter Mrs. Ling had the hideous spectacle of her beloved husband, an honourable man, one of the richest silk merchants in the native city of Shanghai, trundling about with the most absurd-looking women. It even added to her anger when she perceived that he danced very badly, and while she pitied him for his ridiculousness, she hated the women who danced with him, because she knew they could not know how good he was. They only thought he was a silly rich old man and they danced with him for money.

THE DANCE

But soon her anger passed and she fell into great despair. Sitting beautifully erect and motionless against the wall, the hard white electric light falling upon her exquisite and delicately lined face, the tears began to shine in her eyes. She opened her eyes proudly and did not wipe them away. They gathered slowly and rolled down upon her stiff brocaded satin robe, which would not absorb them. Then they fell into small wet balls upon the dusty floor.

For what she saw now was her utter destruction. These women were not honourable and decent courtesans. They were not those women who humbly keep their place in the scheme of life and earn their living in quiet ways serving men. These were the women of whom she had heard, the bold modern women, the women who clutch at a man and demand to be the only woman in his house and hold back their bodies and clamour and refuse until he has lost everything for their sakes, until he has divorced his own real wife and sent her in shame away and put in her place this — this painted image of a woman. She stared at her husband, her face smooth, the tears gathering in her eyes. In his arms now he held such a woman, a small young girl with a bold rosy face and bright black eyes. She was wrapped in a tight scarlet satin robe split to the thigh and showing her bare flesh. In her wifely place would this one be set. She was sure of it. She knew her poor old silly man. She knew that weak trembling fatuous look that was now upon his face. When he looked like that it was all over with him. Why, when she was young, she had even used it herself, once to get a pair of rubies she wanted, and once or twice to — several times, in fact. He always gave in to her when he looked like that. And even at her best she had never been seductive as this girl was seductive. They were dancing nearer and nearer. She did not move. She sat very proudly.

TODAY AND FOREVER

But she had not counted on what it would do to her to have her husband come so near. Out among the others she could follow his figure, mourning, but still he was one among others. But when he came near she saw him closely. She saw his well-known face and his fat old figure, and the garments she knew so well. She had even ordered them for him, choosing the satin in the shade of old blue suitable to elderly men. It matched very ill with the raw young scarlet pressed against it.

Now they were just opposite her. She looked piteously into her husband's face. He did not even see her. He was looking, his eyes shining and his mouth loose in a smile, at the small lovely careless face not six inches from his. The girl was looking at him, too, smiling, inscrutable, scornful, promising. Mrs. Ling forgot herself. She rose hurriedly and stared at them both and began to weep aloud, her hand clenched and pressed against her mouth. But still her husband did not see her.

Then the girl saw her. She stared straight into

THE DANCE

Mrs. Ling's eyes, and her slender arms dropped from about the fat old man. She came the two steps toward Mrs. Ling, and Mrs. Ling heard a soft hurried voice purring into her ear, "Sit down — you are not well — what is the matter? What can I do for you? Why are you here?"

Mrs. Ling felt two firm little hands pressing her back into the seat and the voice hurried on, "Sit here, I will shield you so no one can see you. Tell me what is wrong."

Mrs. Ling looked up imploringly into the young face above her. It was unbelievably pretty and imperious and petulant. It was all she dreaded. But it was kind. To her astonishment it was kind!

"He is my husband," she faltered. "I beg you to spare him. He is my husband."

The girl turned, astonished, and looked at Mr. Ling, who had come up and was mopping his brow. "Go away," she said, "I want to talk to your wife."

Then in the midst of the dance hall Mrs. Ling heard herself pouring out all her fears to this girl whom she hated — how her husband had been coming here night after night and how she saw herself deposed and sent into the country away from her home, to die. So many old women were having to do that now, now that the young women came and took away their old husbands because they were rich. At this thought she leaned her head against the slight young body and wept afresh.

"Come here," she heard the imperious young voice above her call. She looked up. There her husband stood. It smote her afresh that here was her husband at this woman's beck and call. But it was all over anyway. She was only an old woman. She ought never to have come here. She had no place here, no place anywhere nowadays. Men wanted women young and pretty, and able to read and write and above all to dance. She could never dance, not with her little feet that had been bound in childhood. . . . She wiped her eyes with her silk handkerchief, and then caught her hands together because they trembled. She heard her husband give a laugh, a meaningless embarrassed laugh. He began to speak.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Eh, this is——"

But the girl cut ruthlessly into his speech, her voice a silver dagger to stab him. "I know who she is. She is your wife. You are a silly old fat man. Go home with her and stay there. Do you think I love you? Who could love you? Your stomach is like a rice-bucket. No one could love you except this wife of yours. She loves you because she remembers what you once were. But I have no memories of you. To me you must always be what you are — only a fat old man, a funny fat old man — very rich — but fat — fat — fat — and old——"

Then she changed her voice and bent caressingly over Mrs. Ling. "No one has seen you. Anyway, they will only think I am your daughter. I don't want him. I wanted his money. I tell you that quite plainly. I have to earn my living. But I don't want to earn it from another woman — not from an old woman like you — a good old woman——"

Someone called to her, a gay, hard, loud voice. It was a man, tall and young. Her face lit up suddenly. She forgot these old two——

"Where have you been — oh, where have you been?" she cried, running to him. "I've been waiting hours for you."

THE DANCE

He swept her away into the dancing brilliant crowd.

So the two were left there, the old two. Mrs. Ling sat silent a moment, looking down. She was suddenly afraid of her husband. He might blame her bitterly for taking his pleasure away from him. But he did not say a word. She stole a look at him. He was staring at the moving, tripping, weaving figures. He suddenly appeared very tired. He swallowed once or twice, and then, looking closer, she saw he was hurt. Instantly she longed to do something for him, to fetch him some tea, to push him down gently into a comfortable chair and make him easy and happy, to restore his spirit and make him know he was honoured and respected and the head of a house. She rose, instantly herself.

"I am tired and want to go home," she said.

"Of course," he answered. "I will take you."

Together they went out of the hall. She turned once and looked about. Far away she saw a gleam of scarlet pressed ardently against a tall black robe. She went on.

They climbed into their motor-car and drew the rug over their old knees.

After a while she glanced out of the corner of her eye at her husband. He sat timidly and in silence, his round face hanging, the smile quite gone from it. She yearned over him. Somehow she must make him know she would never speak to him of what had happened, never reproach him. She coughed a little.

"These modern women," she said, her voice carefully light, "are amusing. I am glad to have seen them just the once. It has been an interesting evening for me." Then after a moment she said tenderly, "Your legs are weary, I know. I will rub your ankles with oil when we get home. It was so good of you to dance with that rude young girl! I was quite angry because she was so rude to you."

TODAY AND FOREVER

She waited. He cleared his throat loudly.

"Yes," he said at last. "But really, I am too old to dance. Besides I am a man of affairs and I have no time for this sort of thing."

"Indeed you have not," she said warmly. "You are a very important man."

"Yes," he said. "I really am very busy. To-morrow I must——"

She did not listen. She leaned back smiling, weary, at peace. That young girl, that dear young girl—these modern women were wonderful—wonderful——

Shanghai Scene

YUAN had, of course, been looking for work many months, or he would not have accepted so small a position at the Shanghai railway station. On the day he was handed his college diploma on imitation sheepskin he had seen himself an official in the national government in the new capital, or at least a secretary to such an official, since his English was excellent. He had written many weekly themes in English on subjects of the highest nature, arguing such a point, for instance, as whether or not the ancient walls of Peking should be torn down in the interests of the modern age, or whether they should be allowed to stand as historic monuments. He always proved triumphantly that they should be torn down, for he believed passionately in what he and his fellows called "the new day."

But after his graduation he found he could not, in spite of his ability to write English themes, secure a position in the government, not even a position of fourth secretary. There were, it seemed, many hundreds of young men like himself, equally gifted in writing English themes, and differing only in the sort of titles they chose, some preferring to write on such subjects as "Moonlight on West Lake," or "Dying Love," or even on "Our Hero Sun Yat-sen." Yet Yuan could not be convinced that the reason for his failure was that there were these other young men. When he had considered everything many times, he decided that the real trouble was his old father, who was mediocre and without influence.

TODAY AND FOREVER

His father was nothing more than a general shopkeeper on a small street. It was true that he sold some foreign wares, such as second-hand bicycles, but still he was only a shopkeeper. He could do nothing even for his only son, although he loved Yuan and spent much time he could ill spare, going to offices and places of government to ask for appointments with various officials whose names he had seen in the papers. He even had special cards printed on square bits of cardboard announcing himself as a dealer in Western machinery of all kinds. But this was no use, especially after one day through ignorance he asked to see an official who had already been removed in some disgrace.

When Yuan heard this he groaned in shame for his father's ignorance and rushed to his room and there cried out to himself in despair, "No wonder I can find no position worthy of me, when my father is such a fool!" And he passionately hated all common and stupid people like his father.

Nevertheless, even he could understand that his father had done all he could, and so when one day the old man came home rubbing his hands and laughing aloud and crying out, "Oh, Yuan, at last I have a government position for you," Yuan smiled although he did not expect much. But even so it was less than he had expected. His father had had a customer a few days before who wore a uniform, and, seeing this, the old man had had an idea. He inquired of the man :

SHANGHAI SCENE

"And which is your honoured government department?"

"Railways," the man replied carelessly.

So the old man, when this official had chosen a bicycle, and it was the newest in the shop, told him of his wonderful son who longed to serve his country in the government, and at last he offered the bicycle as a gift if the official would give Yuan a job in railways. And the official, who liked the bright red colour of the bicycle, agreed. Telling of this, the father ended by saying joyfully :

"And, Yuan, his uniform was incomparable ! It is blue, a bright blue, with a star here, and here, and a foreign cap. You shall have one exactly like it."

But in his ignorance this old man did not know that naturally Yuan could not be allowed to wear such a uniform in so lowly a position. It is true he had a sort of foreign cap, but his uniform was of plain black cotton cloth, for his sole duty was to hold back the stupid country folk who crowded into the third- and fourth-class cars of the trains.

This was his life, then. Instead of sitting in the quiet, orderly class-room, filled with students, studying literature and English, now all day long, except for the brief intervals between trains, Yuan held the gate against these people. They understood nothing. They came at dawn to buy tickets for a train that did not leave before noon, and they would not go away. There they sat, huddled upon the ground, their cloth-wrapped bundles tied upon their backs, their worn hands idle, waiting for the gate to open. Whenever the gate opened they leaped up and rushed to it, crowding and pushing, their faces instantly strained, anxious, bewildered, yet determined. Now it was Yuan's duty to shout at them, asking, "What is your train? Where do you go? Have you a ticket?" And then he must shout over and over, after hearing their replies given in all imaginable country dialects, "This is not the train you want — you may not pass!" or to a few he said, "Show your ticket!"

TODAY AND FOREVER

These things he said every day, day after day, to people who seemed not to vary at all from each other. Every day there were these same brown, anxious, weathered faces, the same dull bewildered eyes, the same patched blue cotton clothes, the same awkward bundles tied with bits of rope, the same stupid rushing to any open gate.

He grew to hate these people with a passionate, mighty hatred. And he hated them the more because he could think of no way in which he could improve or enlighten them and so remove from himself the weight of their daily stupidity. He spent two evenings writing out large placards of the simplest instructions; but these people could read not one word, he discovered, and they regarded the placards as having nothing to do with themselves. When Yuan pointed furiously at them the first morning, the man in front of the crowd, a young farmer with a wide mouth, grinned and said in apology:

"Sir, I have not one character in my belly, for I never went to school, being so bitter poor all my days."

There remained nothing, therefore, but to remove the placards and go on as he had before, shouting and screaming and threatening the crowd of peasants until the mass were thrust back and the few separated from it who were to go on the train next to depart.

SHANGHAI SCENE

All day Yuan struggled there, every day from dawn until dark.

At last it came to be that even at night he felt himself struggling against these stupid people. In his sleep he dreamed of them, dreamed of their dark, frightened faces, of their bewildered eyes. For they never learned. Day after day they were the same. It could not be possible that they were daily and forever new people. Men and women who left their homes must return again. It must be that at least some of them time and time again rushed to the gate and tried to push through, struggling against him.

And he was only one against so many. There was only he to stem this dull tide, to clarify their endless confusion. It began at last to be too much for him. He saw himself as he was, young and ineffectual, his learning and education worthless since all he could find to do was this one same thing which taught no one anything. Against this mountain of the stupidity and ignorance of these his own people he might fling his body daily and daily bruise his spirit, and they were not even aware of him.

The result of this was that he began to grow morose and was always filled with threatening tensivity. Daily he still flung himself more madly and more bitterly against the crowds, pitting himself against them, his one brain against the mountain of their ignorance. He became a shrieking, shouting machine, cursing the people while he struggled to hold the gates.

And then one morning for a few moments quite suddenly he went insane. There was not even a crowd at the time. It was between trains, and he leaned against the gate, his teeth set, girding himself for what must come within the half-hour. And just at that moment an old farmer came hurrying to the gate, his bare feet dusty and grey with long walking on country roads, his bundle on his back, his blue coat patched, his staff in his hand, his face brown and strained with anxiety lest he miss his train. Without a word this solitary old man ran a little and tried to push open the gate.

TODAY AND FOREVER

But Yuan, looking at him, did not see him solitary. In this one face he saw millions of others everywhere in the country, everywhere these bewildered eyes, this patched coat, these dusty bare feet, this ignorance — this hopeless ignorance ! And seeing, he went mad. Grinding his teeth, he fell upon the old man without mercy, beating his head, his face, his shoulders, and weeping aloud as he did this. One or two men who stood near tried to pull him away, but no one could restrain him. Upon the person of this old man Yuan wreaked an unutterable vengeance for all his disappointment and for all his dreary days.

But his English did him some good after all. For he heard an English voice cry out :

“ Oh, look at that wicked young man beating the poor old farmer ! ”

What the others had not been able to do this English voice now did. Yuan came suddenly to himself. One could not behave thus before a foreigner. He glanced up quickly, his breath coming in great gusts. There stood a foreign woman, her face moved with compassion, and compassion not for him but for the stupid old man. Seeing the look, Yuan turned his eyes also upon the old man. It was evident he had understood nothing. He had only cringed and tried to shield himself as best he could, accustomed to blows he did not understand. Now, seeing they were stopped, he stared humbly at Yuan, and then approached the gate once more, timidly but again with dull determination, not knowing that the beating had anything to do with it.

SHANGHAI SCENE

Yuan choked and wiped his lips with his hand. He sighed heavily. And after a moment's rest again he said as he had said so many, many times :

"Where do you go? Have you your ticket? It is too early!"

Hearts Come Home

YOUNG David Lin stood moodily in the corner of the large parlour and watched the eight or ten couples of his friends gravely dancing. The music of an industrious brass band blared forth from behind a clump of palms planted in pots. He knew, of course, it was a very rich and expensive room, since it belonged to Mr. Fang, who was one of the leading bankers in the city of Shanghai. Mr. Fang would not tolerate anything that was not rich and expensive. The walls therefore were hung in modern oil paintings and also in very delicate and exquisite old scrolls, for, Mr. Fang always said, his fat and shining face expanding into great thick wrinkles of laughter, "I have the best of everything, new and old. There is room for it all in my house."

Mr. Fang sat now watching the young people dance, and beside him sat two pretty girls. One of these was his daughter, Phyllis, and the other was his latest concubine, a young actress. They were about the same age, but they were very different. Phyllis, David had decided earlier in the evening, was the prettiest girl in the room. He did not understand how anyone so fat and ugly as Mr. Fang could have this slender bamboo of a girl for a daughter. For she did look like a bamboo. She was pale and a little tall, almost as tall as himself, and she wore a soft green long robe, and her face was not painted, so that it was the colour of new ivory. And her hair was not like these other women's hair. It was not clipped or frizzed or curled or any of those things. It was long and straight and very black and drawn back from her face into a firm knot on her neck. She sat placidly watching her guests, an expression of tranquil pleasure about her pretty lips. As for the concubine, she looked like an actress. She made great eyes and moved her body about and her hair flared out from her too pink and rounded face. David, staring briefly at her, hated her instantly. She would chatter — she would chatter in some barbarous mixture of English and Chinese.

HEARTS COME HOME

He had for some ten minutes been planning to go and ask Phyllis to dance with him, but he had been held back by this actress. Suppose, he said to himself, that this actress put out her hand — she was forever putting out her hand to the young men who approached her — and before he knew it he would have to dance with her ; he would not, he said to himself, dance with any more frizzy-haired women, no, nor women with painted, powdered faces. Their hair tickled his neck and their faces ruined his foreign coat. He glanced down at his shoulder and brushed it off with the palm of his hand. There was a patch of powder upon it. That was because Doris Li's face had lain there earlier in the evening. He hated Doris Li — a silly creature who pretended she had forgotten how to speak her own tongue because she had been in Paris so long.

With Phyllis he had never danced, because this was the first time he had seen her. She worked somewhere in a school, not in this city, and now she was home for the spring holiday. Mr. Fang had said, introducing her, "This is my one industrious child. The others are content to do nothing."

TODAY AND FOREVER

"You must be proud of her," David had murmured, not looking at her face. He was very tired of girls' faces.

But Mr. Fang only laughed loudly. "She doesn't make enough money for me to be proud of her," he said cheerfully. "She does it to amuse herself."

Then he did look at her — a girl who worked to amuse herself! He had never seen such a thing. For the first time in months he was interested even for a moment in a girl. With something more than his usual fixed smile he said, "May I have a dance?" But she had already promised every dance. For a moment he was sorry. Then he said to himself it did not matter. After all, she was only old Fang's daughter and another girl. He danced desultorily through the afternoon with several girls. He could scarcely remember them now. They all left powder on his coat, though, he remembered gloomily.

Then old Fang had decided they would not stop at the end of the programme. He loved dancing, bounding about the room like a huge balloon in his floating silk robes, his round face glittering with smiles, and his laughter roaring out when he stepped on someone's foot as he passed. Now he shouted at the musicians, peering at them through the palms, "Play three more numbers and you shall have a double tip!" So saying, he seized his concubine and they were off. Against his protruding bulges she leaned herself gaily, her eyes roving away from him and about the room.

HEARTS COME HOME

It was David's chance. Quickly, for he saw converging upon Phyllis three dapper, beautifully dressed young men, he hastened himself and appeared before her. "May I——"

But the young men also hastened themselves. "May I——" "May I——" "May I——" Their voices were like the rounds he used to have to sing in the American school where he was educated. He stood back stiffly — let her choose. She chose very easily, rising and moving toward him. "You were first?" she said in a pleasant little voice. "Yes," he said, and they moved out into the room.

In the noise of the music it was impossible to talk. That was like old Fang, too, to go and hire a double brass band for a tea. The room shook in the noise. He held her to him in the approved modern fashion, breast to breast, thigh to thigh. Her cheek was against his shoulder. He danced well and he knew it, but then, he found, so did she. She gave and swayed so easily to his body that he grew suspicious and looked down at her. Was she being perhaps a little too easily yielding? He was tired of girls who yielded too easily. But her small pale face was quite cold, and her eyes, when she turned them up to his prettily, were passionless. She smiled and said something, but he could not hear her voice. He raised his eyebrows and she laughed, and they did not try again. At the end of the dance the young men were waiting for her solidly, so he let her go with no more than his usual carefully effusive thanks. "You dance swell, Miss Fang. Gee, it's good to get a good partner!"

"Thank you, Mr. Lin. You dance swell, too," she answered easily.

He did not dance again, although there were girls without partners. Doris Li was one of these, and she came languishing and laughing past him. But he bent ostentatiously to tie his shoe-string. He wasn't going to dance again. He pondered on Phyllis a moment, although he had now for a long time not thought about any girls at all. He thought in fact about nothing except his work, which he liked very much. It was that of a manager in his father's printing house. He thought all the time about how to improve the printing of their books. He used to think about girls a great deal, but that was before he tired of them. They were so much alike. Every girl in Shanghai, he had long ago decided, was like every other. He listened cynically when his friends grew excited over a new beauty. There was not such a thing.

TODAY AND FOREVER

The tea ended and people began to go away, gay couples hand in hand going off together to some other amusement. The band was silent, and instead the air was filled with a clatter of thanks and farewells, Chinese and English mingled in word and sentence. It was very smart to speak so, just as it was smart to take foreign first names. He could speak the jargon, too, when he must. He had, in fact, many ways of speaking. He could speak American college boy or Oxford English or the precise old Chinese his father still demanded of him, or this jargon of English and Chinese his friends now practised. It all depended on where he was.

But he secretly liked the Chinese best, although he made fun of it to his own friends. They all said over and over, "There are so many modern things we cannot say in Chinese. How, for instance, do you say——" He always agreed, and they had fun trying to twist the old staid words to say even such things as "Hot mamma," "You're my baby," "I'm nuts about you." But afterwards he felt uncomfortable, as though he had taught a child to say innocently an obscene thing. For the old words would not say these things. Twisted thus, they made no sense, saying nothing at all, remaining serenely themselves and refusing to be perverted.

HEARTS COME HOME

He joined the ebbing crowd at the door. Phyllis stood there, smiling, answering gaily, putting out her hand freely to her guests. He looked at her and said to himself gloomily that he was probably wrong in thinking she was different from any of the others. Just now she seemed like any of the others — like any girl. Probably she powdered too. He looked down at his shoulder involuntarily. But no, it was quite clean. He made up his mind instantly.

"May I stay a little while and talk?" he asked.

She hesitated. "I am going to the Casino with friends," she said.

"May I come with you?" he asked at once.

"I suppose you may," she answered.

A servant was there with her coat, and he took it and put it about her shoulders. Suddenly he saw the small fine hairs upon her nape, black against the ivory-pale smooth skin. He felt a strange shock of pleasure in him.

That was the beginning, but the end was almost instantly there. For before the night was over he was wildly in love with her, though the accumulated hatred he had for all girls was worse than ever. He loathed every girl he saw at the Casino that night. They were the worst of their kind, he thought, his heart scornful behind his smiling face. He danced with them when he could not get Phyllis, practising all the little attentions of smart behaviour while he hated them. When he took a hand, he hated it for its prettiness and its scarlet nails. It made him curious to know what Phyllis's hands were. He must look the first moment he could. In the little alcove where he sat out a dance with another girl he kissed her coldly, when she leaned toward him for his kiss. It was nothing to kiss a girl, nothing to him. He rubbed his lips secretly while he was pretending to wipe his face with his handkerchief. He hated rouge — Phyllis's lips — he began wondering about her lips.

TODAY AND FOREVER

There it was. Once he began this sort of wonder he could not stop it, and day after day of spring sunshine hurried him. Besides, she would be going away again. He had to hurry. He begged a holiday from his father and beset her daily, using all his technique. After all, he told himself, she was a modern girl, and probably she liked all this stuff. He sent her flowers and candy, and found copies of freshly printed books and had them under his arm when he appeared before her, so that he never went without gifts.

But of course all these gifts — they must have meaning. He watched her to see if they meant anything. "Like candy, kid?" he inquired of her carelessly, presenting her with a five-pound box of foreign chocolates. Did her face fall a little? But her voice came with careful enthusiasm. "Oh, swell, Dave," she replied. They spoke English almost entirely, and since they had both gone to an American university they spoke what they had learned there. "Sure you like it?" he pressed her. "Crazy about it," she replied. He stared at her. She talked as they all did, but somehow it never seemed her language. She opened the box and exclaimed cheerfully, "Oh, aren't they lovely — oh, how nice!" Then she put it down on the table.

HEARTS COME HOME

Yes, he used his technique, all the modern technique they used on each other. He took her everywhere, to dance, to the theatre, and she went willingly. In the taxicab he reached for her hand and held it, and once he seized her by the shoulders and would have kissed her, but unexpectedly she bent her head quickly and his lips touched her cheek and not her lips. He had planned the kiss with some enthusiasm, too — more enthusiasm than he had felt in such things for a long time. But, foiled, he had no enthusiasm at all. Her cheek was quite cold. She did not take her hand away from his, but it lay there passively, and he wished it would not be rude to put it down.

Yet he loved her more all the time. Because he could not seem to get at her he loved her. She did not repulse him, she never repulsed him. She took her part in all his plans, she refused him nothing. If he took her arm, she leaned against him a little — she had no old-fashioned ways. But there it was. She did all these things as though it were a pattern she had been taught to do. It was a technique with her. It was a technique of love for them both. He wanted her to know he loved her, and he had no way to tell her except this modern way. "I'm crazy about you, kid," he said. "Sure, I'm crazy about you, too," she answered politely, and his heart chilled in him.

And all the time the days were passing, the days of the short month he had, and he could not break away the barrier of modern technique. Once at the door after a late dance he leaned to her, "Kiss me good-night, Phyllis?"

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Yes," she answered readily, and touched his cheek easily with her calm lips.

It was all nothing. They were growing not nearer but further apart. Words and touch only were pushing them apart. He did not know what to do, so he kept on doing what they were doing.

Then suddenly the day before she went away they discovered each other. They were dancing together at the Casino again, close, welded together, when suddenly she stopped and pulled away from him and looked at him.

"Do you truly like this?" she asked him. He was startled. Her voice was changed, softer, deeper. She was speaking in Chinese, in their own tongue! Why had they never spoken in Chinese? There had been some nonsense of different dialects. She was not native to Shanghai — her family had come from the north — English was smarter, and so they pretended it was easier. But it was not. He understood her perfectly in Chinese. He looked back at her intensely. The tawdry dancing hall faded from around them. "I do not like it," he replied. "I cannot tell you how greatly I do not like it."

"Then let us go away," she said simply.

She was quite different from anything he had known of her before. In the car she sat with such reserve and dignity that he did not want to take her hand. At this moment he was nearer to her when he did not take her hand. At her door he hesitated. But she said, "Will you come in? I think there is speech we wish to have together."

"I have many things to say," he answered.

It seemed indeed that they had never talked at all. All the foolish foreign words they had interchanged had said nothing. Now crowding to his tongue were other words, their own words. Everything remained yet to be said. She sat down on the satin-covered couch, and he sat on a chair near her. She looked at him, and then she looked around the room. "I dislike all of this," she said, sweeping her hand through the air. "You do not know me at all. You do not even know my true name. I am not what I have seemed to you. Now that I am about to go away I want you to know that I am very old-fashioned. I have been all this month doing things with you which I hate. It is better for you to know. I do not like to dance. I dislike foreign sweets. I do not like to kiss people. It makes me feel ill to kiss anyone or to feel anyone's lips upon my face or hand — even yours I do not like."

HEARTS COME HOME

"Wait," he interrupted. "I see now I have felt what you were all along. I see why we were never near to each other. Why did you come with me to dances, and why did you let me kiss you? If you had said you did not like it I would not have done so."

She dropped her head and looked at her hands tightly clasped in her lap. She answered, shyly, "I thought you liked these foreign ways and I wanted to be what you liked. I thought if I refused you might not — come again." Her voice was very small indeed when she finished.

"What is your true name?" he demanded of her.

"It is Ming Sing — Shining Heart," she replied.

"Mine is Yung An — Brave Peace," he said.

They were silent a moment.

Then he went on. He leaned forward in his chair. "You mean — you do mean truly that you like our own ways best?"

"Much, much best," she faltered.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"You would not like a house like this?" he questioned her sternly.

"No," she faltered.

"Nor dancing nor motoring nor any of these things the women do all day?"

"No."

"We need never waste our time so any more," he said, after a moment.

"Never any more," she answered.

He waited another moment. "I also do not like to kiss," he announced.

"Then let us not kiss each other any more," she said.

"We will speak our own language and I will take off these foreign garments and put on my robes again and we will live in old comfortable ways and I will smoke a water-pipe."

"I will never wear leather shoes again," she said. "And I will never eat butter again, which I hate, nor any foreign foods, and our table will always be set with bowls and chopsticks, and I shall have a house with courts and no stairs, and I want many children."

He saw it all as she spoke, their house, their home, everything their own, and themselves as they really wanted to be. He began to pour out his words, "Will you then marry me? Shall we——" Then he stopped. He rose to his feet and stood resolutely before her. "No," he said. "Miss Fang, my father will write your father a letter. It will come soon — at once——" He was already half-way to the door. Now he was at the door, and he looked back at her. She rose and bowed, and stood looking at him, too, waked, warm as a rose. He saw her for the first time. This was how she truly was, this lovely, natural creature of his own kind. They would raise lotus flowers in the pool in the court, and they would have a little bamboo grove and read poetry there in the summer — old four-lined verses. He had always wanted to have time for it.

HEARTS COME HOME

“Are you going, Mr. Lin?” she asked in the old formula of farewell.

The words came so sweetly from her tongue that his feet had carried him back a step before he knew it. Then he caught himself. No. “No more foreign ways,” he said firmly. He went out into the hall, and then he put his head in to look at her once more. She was sitting quietly upon the couch, her little hands folded, her little feet placed neatly together, exactly as his own old mother might have sat as a girl. She was looking ahead of her, seeing, he knew, the house, the court, the many children, the safe old ways of living. She was there waiting, so pretty, so pretty—— “At least not yet,” he amended, hurrying.

His Own Country

JOHN DEWEY CHANG had always known that Mott Street, New York, was not his own country. People said Chinatown, but it was not the same as his own country. He was perfectly familiar with all these noisy, narrowing streets, he knew the shops whose windows were filled with a mixture of things from across the sea and things American, he knew the men and women and the many children whose skin was yellow like his own, and whose eyes were all black. Many of them, like himself, had been born in these crowded lively streets, and had never seen anything else. But still he knew this was not his country.

Not that he was at all strange or that, at least as a child, he had disliked Chinatown. For a long time, indeed, he had not thought about any other country. He had grown from placid babyhood, eternally carried on his mother's arm when he was awake and staring with her into the moving variety of the street outside his father's curio shop. Asleep he was carried into a little dark inner room smelling of dried herbs and ginger and tea, and these two places were his world, and, so far as he knew, his country.

The first time, indeed, that he knew he did not belong here, that none of them belonged here, was when he went to school. His parents, discussing the matter loudly over their rice-bowls, had decided against kindergarten, and he had not minded. It was more fun to dart about the streets with many other small boys, more white than yellow, to crouch on the backs of automobiles, and tease the kindly policemen. But the day came when he was six years old and this sort of thing had to cease. It was time his education began. His mother, her old black cotton Chinese coat unfastened at the throat and her hair yet uncombed, early in the morning dressed him immaculately in a blue striped sailor suit, admonishing him in their own language the while as to how small boys behaved their first day at school. She never had learned English, not in all these years. He spoke her own language to her, but when he was in the streets he forgot that he spoke anything except the jargon of the white boys. He listened to her gravely, aware of some decorum settling upon him that was not of New York. "So small Chinese boys behave," his mother said very gravely, and his father said, "Do not forget you are a son of Han, and that you do not belong to these wild white tribes among whom we must live until I can grow rich. Be polite to your teacher, obey what your elders command, and keep your mind on your books."

HIS OWN COUNTRY

All during breakfast, his father and his mother paused, holding their chopsticks above their bowls of rice gruel, to give him further excellent advice. After his breakfast his father had given him his school name, John Dewey Chang. To this time he had been called at home Little Dog, and on the street Chink. But his father had written this name down upon a bit of paper, so that he might give it to the teacher, that it might be written correctly in the records, John Dewey Chang. John Dewey, his father explained, was the name of an American who had helped to start good new schools in China. He had read about it in the papers from his home town there.

TODAY AND FOREVER

Almost immediately after his father had taken him to school and introduced him to the teacher, his education began. For it happened that the pupils were told to form in line and march from this small schoolroom into a larger one. Two by two they must march. John Chang took his place with alacrity, his face beaming with interest. Two by two they went ahead of him and behind him, but no one came to stand beside him. Two by two they stood, with himself alone in the middle, until finally there was only a small fat white girl left, a round little girl with tight light braids tied with bits of red ribbon. She stood alone also.

"Mary," said Miss Pinckney, "you may come and stand by John."

But Mary would not come. To his astonishment John saw the little girl shake her head violently. "I won't," she said unpleasantly. "I won't walk beside a Chinaman."

Miss Pinckney stared severely for a moment at her and then took John's hand herself. "Very well," she said, "you may walk alone, and I will walk with John."

There was intense silence along the double row, and John Dewey Chang knew that it was not the silence of sympathy. He grasped Miss Pinckney's hand gingerly, but without pleasure. He would, he knew, much rather have been walking with Mary.

HIS OWN COUNTRY

This was the beginning of his education.

His education, thus begun, continued through many years. He became accustomed after a while to other things. Quietly he learned to wait until everyone else found partners, and then, if he were lucky enough to be the odd one, he stood alone at the end. If the number were even, particularly if the other were a girl, he learned to stand a little aloof delicately, waiting. He grew to feel, as though he had antennae, the atmosphere, whether it was welcome or rebuff. He never complained, never told his parents. He withdrew into himself instead and became a silent, studious youth, very quiet and neat and dark. He made it a point to be first in his classes and to carry off prizes. His parents were very proud of him. They talked together of what they would do when he was old enough to take the shop. But though he spent his evenings over his father's ledgers when his lessons were done, he knew he would never take the shop. For by now he knew this was not his country, and he had one deep secret purpose, one aching ambition. He must find his own country.

The curios, the beads, the idols, the misty paintings on the scrolls, the hundreds of odd bits of strange beauty his father had for sale, only made him more eager to go to their source. He unpacked them tenderly from their straw-stuffed boxes, great wooden boxes, stamped with red and black hieroglyphics, wondering, dreaming, of another land where beauty like theirs was shaped — his own country.

Of this country he had, of course, heard from many. He had learned to read not only Shakespeare and American history and Whittier and Longfellow, but he had learned also the long straight lines of the letters of his own language. At night an old man came to tutor him, and to teach him the sing-song rhythms of old poetry. His neighbours, George Liu and Ruth Kin, rebelled bitterly and never learned enough to understand the inner meaning of those curves and squares. Ruth tossed her pretty curled black head, and, chewing her gum quickly, she said loudly, "Gee, what's it all about! Say, I gotta 'nough without that stuff!" She had a dark slanting eye upon Harry Sills, the young grocery man next door. Not that she would marry a white man, of course, but white men were fun. Of course she'd settle down and marry a Chink one of these days, but not one of the old-fashioned kind. She'd marry a smart fella, maybe George Liu, if he turned out smart enough, and they'd have a little flat with an electric range. When anyone asked her if she ever wanted to go home to China, she screamed with laughter and said, "To what? Not for mine! Say, they tell me they ain't even got electric lights in the ole home town in China! And say, they're still keepin' the girls at home over there!" She screamed again with her high light laughter, a little loudly, for Harry Sills was at the door of his store. He grinned at her lazily. "Say, I'll bet they couldn't keep you at home, if you was there!" he called to her.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"That's no bet — that's sure!" she retorted, narrowing her eyes at him. She'd seen Anna May Wong do that in the movies, and she liked it, liked that Oriental lure.

John Dewey Chang watched her gravely. It was just after sunset and he was home from high school. It was his last year. Next year he'd go to college, and after that he'd go to his own country. His country — that word was now beginning to mean something beautiful and secret. He gazed thoughtfully up and down the street. Noise was everywhere, the noise of cars and of children. On the next street a trolley shrieked around the corner. At his feet his last brother picked industriously at John Dewey's shoe-strings. He was not quite two, and with his coming the small flat above the shop was crowded to its last limit. But it had not occurred to them to have more room. They slept more thickly in the two bedrooms, but always decorously, his sisters in the other room, his parents' bed curtained and partitioned away with wall-board. But he would be glad to be gone. Staring into the noise and confusion of a late spring evening in that crowded street he thought with longing of his own country. There, there were quiet streets and singing country folk and richly tilled fields and courtesy and stillness and certainty. He would be among his own there, his own kind. He had heard his mother tell such tales of the small country town where she grew up, a town in south China where everybody, she said, was happy. All the girls were pretty and good, not like these girls with yellow hair and painted lips and especially not like silly Ruth Kin. He was suddenly very homesick for that which he had never seen.

HIS OWN COUNTRY

All during his four years at the state college he held steadfastly to his plan. He grew very Chinese indeed, and he allowed his fellows to think that he had come, not from that crowded rowdy street in New York, but from the sedate and dignified little Chinese town in south China. It was during these years that his country fell into revolution, and he organized a band of patriots among the seven Chinese boys in the college. He denied himself his luncheon each day and saved the money, and he bullied the other members of the club into paying more than they were able, and when after three months the fund amounted to more than ninety dollars, they debated fiercely as to what it should be given for in China. Studying the newspapers and the bulletins from their country, they perceived there were many things for which this sum could be given ; it might be given for the starving, for there was a famine again, or it might be given for the airplanes the new government needed, or it might be given for roads. After weeks of indecision, they decided on new roads. So the money was changed into a note, and sent to the government in Nanking, with a long letter explaining the wishes of the donors. After nearly six months a courteous letter came in reply, to which was affixed the seal of the Republic, saying that the money had been received and would be assuredly spent for roads, and then after words of commendation for such patriotism the letter closed, and was signed by the Third Secretary to the President.

TODAY AND FOREVER

It was the first touch with his country. John, holding the letter in his hand, felt his heart thicken with emotion. When he read the letter aloud to the others, he could scarcely keep from weeping. When Art Lok said with cynicism, " Yeah, it's fine talk — my dad says the same chaps used up all the money they sent over last year to buy an airplane, only there wasn't any airplane ! " John Chang flew at him, " Will you revile your own country ? Will you say your own President's secretary lies ? " he cried.

Art twisted his thin handsome mouth and sneered and fell silent. After all, it was no business of his. He began thinking of an engagement he had to keep that night at a certain small café with a very yellow-haired girl. He began to whistle softly.

HIS OWN COUNTRY

But there it was. All during college when the others were playing football or going to movies or making dates, John Chang worked on his plans for his country. Here was the question: Should he delay his return further by taking some sort of special course — say, be an aviator or an architect or a doctor — or should he go straight home as soon as he was through? He argued it with himself, longing to go straightway, waiting for nothing. After all, a college education was something. He could get a job teaching or in the government — there were jobs everywhere these days, in these new and glorious days in his own country. It was not as it was here in the United States, where people were pushing and jostling each other for work. Over there roads were growing, airplanes were flying, new buildings going up, business developing — the whole nation was moving, running ahead — better to join his youth to it now, without waiting. Anyway, better to go on and see what was wanted and if necessary he would come back. Only he knew he would never come back. He graduated from college and then hurried back to Mott Street, to bid his parents good-bye, to buy a third-class ticket to China.

Then he was delayed after all. He was delayed by his own most surprising reluctance to go. When he had endured the noise and the heat of the flat for two weeks, when he had bought his ticket and had talked with his parents about everything, when his mother had said to him over and over again, "Now when you see my honoured mother-in-law, you must say it is my grief I am not there to serve her, and when you see my honoured father-in-law and my brothers and their ladies——” and when his father had talked with enthusiasm of the new times, “In my youth there was nothing a lad could do if he were the eighth son on a little land, and so I had to seize the chance of my father’s eldest cousin to come abroad with him in his business, and here I have remained and they sent your mother to me, and here you have been born. I return you proudly to my own country——” when everything was said and everything was ready, suddenly John Chang found he did not want to go.

TODAY AND FOREVER

At first he could not understand his reluctance. Certainly it was not this noisy city which held him. He stood looking at the traffic one night in a melancholy fashion. He did not love these dashing lights, approaching, glaring for an instant into his face, disappearing again. There was no music in the roar and the grind of trolley-cars to have made him homesick. Except the faces of his family there were no faces which he cared if he saw again or not — no faces — and then with fury he realized there was a face, a little round merry face under frizzy black hair. It was that face which was making all the trouble. He wanted to see it again and again and again, and it was Ruth Kin’s face !

When he realized this he went quickly into the house and into a dark corner of the dark little curio shop and there, among the Buddhas and the pottery Han horses and the hanging mandarin coats, he sat down and held his head in his hands. He did not at all wish to love Ruth Kin. He did not want to marry. If he thought about marrying, it was not someone like Ruth Kin. His mother had spoken of the women across the sea, their stillness, their gentleness, their mild sweet eyes, their obedience to their lords. Some day, perhaps, he had thought, some day, in a little house with a court and a bamboo grove and an oleander tree he might live with a sweet obedient woman. But not with slangy, lively, noisy Ruth Kin! Yet there it was. He did not want to leave her.

HIS OWN COUNTRY

He had seen her, of course, many times — how, he asked himself bitterly, could one avoid seeing her? She still lived next door, and she came and went loudly and cheerfully to the business school where she was learning stenography so that she might be her father's assistant. Her father, a tea and oil merchant, had never learned the intricacies of customs and accounting, and Ruth long ago had made up her mind that she would take the business in hand as soon as she could. She was always wanting to take things in hand — to manage things. So year by year she had managed a little more and a little more of the stout peaceful old man's affairs, until now, when American retail men came into the wholesale tea shop, it was a smart young American who greeted them, an American with coal-black hair with a strong tendency to straightness, in spite of sedulous care to curling, and black pointed eyes and a rich smooth olive skin. But the voice was American, clear and a little hard, and the words that came from the vivid red lips were pure New York. The men looked at her with laughter and occasionally with longing, longing at least for a little fun. But she never promised them anything, never quite promised them anything. Everyone knew Ruth Kin could take care of herself.

And of course everyone had thought that she would marry George Liu. Even the two families had thought so. Then suddenly, only six months ago, Ruth Kin changed her mind. "No," she told her father firmly. "I don't want to marry George." Everyone knew how she said it, for he told all his friends and they told their wives and so John Chang had heard his mother tell it at the family supper-table.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"That Ruth Kin," she said mournfully, "she is like the Americans. All these years she has been as though betrothed to the son of the Lius, the parents have arranged it, and now she will not marry him."

"Why not?" said the father absently. He was not interested in Ruth Kin or in George Liu, but it was a bit of gossip on Mott Street.

"Who knows?" said his mother, sighing. "She says he is not smart enough. She says she will have only a very smart man."

John Chang, sitting in the curio shop alone, thought of this bitterly. "She will not think me smart," he thought. "She has always made fun of me because I want to go home to my own country. I have heard her say often that I am a fool — that I would do better to take my father's business."

Then remembering Ruth Kin's shining black eyes and her little full red mouth he knew it was no good — he loved her hopelessly.

So he put off his trip a little, not much. He had allowed himself a few more days than necessary in order to see the sights on the west coast. He would see no sights. He said a little sullenly to his parents the next day, "I do not feel well. I will wait a day."

He waited a day, thinking furiously and staying away from Ruth Kin. Ever since he had returned he had made it a habit without knowing it to go and stand at the door and watch for her coming home. Now he would not go, not for a whole day. But the second day was a Saturday, and suddenly he was compelled to see her. He felt if he did not see her just once he could not start next day, and he must start or he would miss his boat. He was angry with himself, he threw himself on his bed and muttered and tossed. Then suddenly he leaped up and ran downstairs and into the shop next door. Because it was a Saturday he knew exactly where he would find Ruth. He would find her in the inner room balancing her father's weekly accounts, her red lips a little pursed, her small brown hands nimble with the pencil.

HIS OWN COUNTRY

There she was exactly. He did not waste an instant. He stood before her, his hair still rumpled, his shirt without any tie. He began hostilely, because she had delayed him in his dear plan :

"Will you come to China with me or won't you ?"

She looked at him, astonished, her eyes open very wide. She never used any lure with John Chang, never at all. They quarrelled too often, and there was too much to say to him. They had quarrelled, for instance, over this very going back home to China. She thrust her pencil into her curly mop, and there it stood upright like a feather of defiance.

"Why should I go to China ?" she answered instantly. "I don't want to go to China ! I'm an American — anybody that's born in New York is an American."

"Because your country has use for you !" he shouted at her. She was so very pretty that he was furious with her. Need she have put on a rose-pink linen dress this morning and need her skin look as smooth as golden cream ? "You stay here when your country can use you !"

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Thank you," she said coolly, "I'll think about it when there are a few electric lights and a bath-tub in the ole home town."

"You think of nothing but comforts," he said. He wanted to shake her, to slap her, to tell her she must come because — because—— "You must come!" he said loudly.

Then she stood up. She put her two little hands on her narrow hips and looked at him from the crown of his stiff rumpled black hair to his rather too yellow oxfords. "Will you please tell me who you think you are, Mr. John Dewey Chang?" she demanded. "You can't talk to an American woman like that and get away with it! And why must I come?"

"Because — because I love you!" he said unexpectedly. He had not really meant to say it.

They stared at each other, and Ruth sat down suddenly and drew the pencil out of her hair and began to figure briskly. "Go away, John Dewey Chang," she said coldly. "Don't be funny."

"It is not funny," he said desperately.

"It is only funny to me," she said. "I go back to China? And with you? It's a joke." She pursed her very red lips merrily and looked at him, for a second, this time with her sidewise look. But when he started toward her, she cried out, "No, I mean it. Go away."

"You mean — to China?" asked John Chang in a small voice.

"Yes, to China," said Ruth Kin, with determination, and shut her mouth hard and turned a page of figures.

He watched her for a second, but she did not change, she did not look up, and he turned. Well, then, he would go. But just at the door she called him again, and he glanced back. She was looking at him thoughtfully and now she said in another voice, a coaxing small voice, and she drooped her lashes a little and looked up at him, "Would you," she said, "would you if I said I would — care about you — stay?"

HIS OWN COUNTRY

He stared at her aghast. What — give up his own country, after all these years of dreams, his beloved and beautiful country?

"No!" he shouted. He would not give himself time to think.

She shrugged her shoulders, laughed, and said airily, "Then go — go away to your China!"

So he had gone, in haste and hurry to be gone. Before he could stop to think he was on the train whirling across green country, through great roaring cities, through little towns and vast prairies to the sea coast. Before he could stop to think he was on a great ship, crowded among third-class passengers, and outside there was only the roar of the sea, and inside among all these strangers there was infinite time to think — to think and to dream.

But now his dreams would not come right. They would not take the shapes of old, the shapes of his own people, his coming home to his own race, his life, a leader in the revolution, a governor, a diplomat, a great man of some sort in his own country. No, those dreams came stealing into his mind in the shape of a small round wilful face, of black eyes, Chinese under a crop of American-curved hair, of a slim yellow Chinese body in a rose-pink American dress. He leaped out of his berth again and again and paced the few feet of deck, for he had not ceased to love her and he had not ceased to be angry with her. He told himself many times that she was full of faults — that she was all those things which a Chinese girl should not be — she talked before men and she laughed too loudly and she was disobedient to her parents. Why, she even made fun of her father's lisp when he tried to speak English ! It was true that her father had spoiled her and that he laughed at her, but then she was not respectful. How many times had he not heard his own mother say she came home late at night, every time with a different man ! He cast up all her faults and tried to see how well off he was to be alone — and groaned because he loved her and wished he were not alone.

TODAY AND FOREVER

He began to look forward to his country with renewed eagerness. For now his country was the only thing which could make him forget Ruth. There among all that new life, working, serving, achieving, he would forget about her. He would even — of course he would find the woman whom he really sought — not Ruth, but another. There he would live and found his home and have his children, their mother not Ruth, but a dreamy-eyed, quiet, obedient woman in his house. But first he must work and he must achieve. And first of all he must find his country.

But where was his country ? Upon the sea it had seemed so near, there where the sea ended, there where the river began. This was his country, this first line upon the horizon. He had passed indifferently in the Inland Sea one lovely isle after another ; coldly he had gazed at the rocky, exquisitely outlined mountains of Japan, waiting for this first dark edge between sea and sky. He rose early to see it, and soon after dawn, staring into a grey and misty sky he saw it, that silent line of dark land. Soon the ship was embraced as though by two arms of that land. There were no hills, no houses, nothing to speak to him — only those two dark arms reached out into the sea to embrace him, to draw him home. He hung over the rail of the deck, staring, his heart beating in his throat.

HIS OWN COUNTRY

Then upon the land appeared tiny low houses, isolated, the colour of earth, and then the brown of the earth changed to brilliant green. The sun did not shine and the sky was grey. Against the grey the green was deeply vivid. But houses and fields were small and solitary upon the immensity of these ever-broadening arms of land. Here, here was his country. He yearned to it, he gazed upon it, he longed to leap across the yellow waters of the river and feel it beneath his feet, old, sure, unchanged, silent, welcoming him in silence.

Then suddenly he lost it all. Suddenly the ship passed between tall buildings, edged ponderously to a dock, and all silence was gone, all peace was lost. A horde of small brown blue-coated men leaped across the rails, chattering, shrieking a language he did not even understand. He used upon them the tongue he had from his mother, but they stared at him wild-eyed, searching. He pointed out his few bags, neatly strapped and ready to be taken ashore, but they passed him by as though he had not spoken. They were looking, he realized suddenly, not for him. It was nothing to them that he was come home at last. They were looking for higher folk than he, for tourists, for white men. He set his teeth a moment, staring after their tumbling, crowding figures, and then one by one he picked up his own bags and staggered across the narrow gangway to the dock.

TODAY AND FOREVER

It was at that moment that he lost his country completely. For standing among the crowd pouring from the ship, pouring from the streets, he might have been in any country again. He might even have been again in New York. He heard no tongue he understood except the English he had left behind him. About him were tall Western buildings; he heard the din of street-cars in his ears. Suddenly the rain poured in a drum of noise upon the tin roof of the dock, and he was walled in by it, and he could do no more than wait, walled in with the crowd of alien motley people, not one of whom he knew, and not one of whom was coming to welcome him home. He stood forlornly staring through the rain across the yellow water. A small junk struggled through the mists, its sails lowered, and an oarsman standing at the oar, his brown body naked except for the loin-cloth about his hips. From his unfamiliar form John Chang looked at the ship, the ship from which he had longed so desperately to escape. But now somehow it looked like home to him, a home of a sort, whose ways he knew. At least there he had been safe and sheltered.

Then suddenly he shook himself. This would not do. He must be strong. There was no going back now. In his pocket he had the name of a good inn his father had given him and the name of the cousin who was his partner, upon whom he was to call for aid. He must be beld and remember that somewhere his country lay behind this dock, these crowds, these streets. He laid a hand upon a coolie standing near and pointed to his bags. "Ricksha!" he said with authority, "ricksha!" The man halted, stared, hesitated, took up the bags with a grunt. In a moment John Chang was rolling along, buttoned behind an oil-cloth curtain. He could see nothing except the brown bare legs of the puller, streaming with the rain, and above his head upon the thin roof of the ricksha the rain beat steadily down.

HIS OWN COUNTRY

Where, where was his country? After three days in the small bare room of the inn he sat and stared across a narrow street into a tenement house. Except that the clothes hung upon bamboo poles were shaped differently, it might have been a tenement in New York. In and out of the cheap houses dirty children ran, naked in the stifling midsummer heat. Women shouted after them; slouching men and furtive-eyed young girls came and went. He had seen them all before and they were not his. They were not his, and yet their eyes were black and pointed like his own and their hair black and their skin his skin. But he would not have them for his own.

Already he loathed the inn and determined he must leave it. Yet, when he asked, his cousin shrugged his fat shoulders. "It is good enough, that inn," he said. "A better one would be very dear."

"It is dirty," said John Chang briefly.

"You are like a foreigner," remarked his cousin. "You will become accustomed."

He had been twice to see that cousin, and twice he had come away angry.

It did not seem possible to him that such a man was his cousin. He lived in half a dozen different courts, his many children ran about unwashed, and the noise of quarrelling women was everywhere. And with all these women, these wives and these servants, there was no one to brush away the flies from the tea-bowls upon the table ; and when the cousin invited John Chang to eat with him at his house, the flies sat upon the food. Yet the cousin was not a poor man. He had money, since he was the partner in the curio business, and he it was who shipped the Buddhas and the little ivory boxes and the silver trinkets and the embroidered robes and the incense-sticks and all those things which John Chang had known all his life in the shop on Mott Street, all things which had set him dreaming of his own country. Now when he saw the fat brown hand of his cousin and saw the grease upon his silken gown and the rolls of fat about his neck and about his belly, when in the heat of the day he put his gown from him and sat with his upper body uncovered, he wondered that he had ever dreamed.

TODAY AND FOREVER

His cousin's daughters, too, came and went, and the cousin snapped his fingers to them when he wanted tea or his pipe, or his old shoes to ease his feet. The man boasted of these girls. He said, " As for my girls, I have kept them where they should be kept, in the home. They have fretted now and again to go to some school or other, but I have seen these bold modern girls on the streets, and I know they are nothing but trouble with all their learning and their boldness — trouble for their father who must feed them, and trouble for the men they must marry. I have married ignorant women and they have done me very well." He puffed at his pipe and shouted at his daughter who stood before him to hear any further commands. " Go to your mother and do not hang about to hear men talk ! " When the girl was gone he said with complacence, " You see how obedient she is. She will be as obedient as that one day to her husband. It has been my care to prepare my daughters for marriage, for there is nothing else a woman can do."

HIS OWN COUNTRY

And, indeed, John Chang, watching, saw the girl go docilely away; as silently as though no one stepped she went in her little satin shoes. But although her face was very pretty and she was well-mannered and said not one word, and was the sort of maid he had dreamed about once, he did not feel his heart move at all when he looked at her. He said to himself, "It is because she is the daughter of my second cousin," but when he went back to his room in the inn and sat down alone he found in surprise that it was not because she was the daughter of his cousin, but because she seemed stupid to him, and her pretty silent face was only like a doll's face; and, thinking further, he was not sure it would be such pleasure to have a doll for a wife, who put up her arm when she was bidden and kissed him when she was bidden and came when she was bidden and went away when she was bidden to do it. Suddenly there flew into his mind the thought of Ruth Kin and how no one could make her do what she would not do, and there she was before him, laughing and wilful and mischievous. He was glad she was not here.

But after a while, thinking and staring through the rain, he came to the thought that this was not his country, not this dirty city of Shanghai, noisy with vehicles and crowded with every sort of people. Somewhere beyond these flat horizons was more, miles upon miles of his vast country, for him to discover.

So again he went to his cousin and said, "I want to go further away, into the inlands; I want to see and I want to discover."

TODAY AND FOREVER

At this his cousin fanned himself quickly and said, "I hope you are not one of those young revolutionists who have been the pest of our country in these last years! But if you are, do not tell me—I do not want to hear any of it. But if you want to go inland, then I have an errand for your father on which you may go. You are to go to the regions at the end of the great river, into the province of Szechuan. I hear there have been new graves discovered there of ancient princes, and if it is true, you can find curios cheaply and buy what you can and bring them back. But do not buy this and this——" and then the cousin detailed what he should not buy and what was true and what was false, because at such times among the true there are many false things, made by men who think it possible to sell them mingled together.

Thus John Chang went in search of his own country, following the sweep of the great river.

Everywhere he searched for his country and everywhere he found only the same thing. He found cities crowded and noisy and filthy with generations of filth. He grew afraid to drink anything except the hottest tea, although the summer sun scorched his flesh, and he ate only a little rice and cabbage, because there was no ice and nothing to keep from putridness the slabs of pigs hung in the sun and the fish dying in their tubs of stale water and the crabs upon which the flies sat unceasingly. At night the mosquitoes fed upon him, and if he stopped in inns the insects swarmed to him. He could not see the beauty of the distant hills, nor could he see the rich green banks flourishing in rice and the great nets let down to catch the large river fish, because upon the little river steamer with him were two hundred pilgrims going to an ancient temple on a mountain top to worship there, and holy men have the vilest bodies to be found, and these reeked with all their filth and holiness. Yet they were his countrymen, Yes, they were all his countrymen — the blind he met so often on the streets of any town where the steamer stopped ; the children running as they would, unclothed ; the brawling women washing by the river's edge and beating out their rags upon the rocks, and quarrelling as they worked ; and the shrewd petty shopkeepers ; and the beggars whining everywhere, full of leprosy and holding out their maimed limbs. One day he stopped among them and cried to his own heart, staring at them, " Is this the country I dreamed of all these years, and can any lifetime save them ? "

HIS OWN COUNTRY

And for a moment he was conscious of an aching in him for some other place, a homesickness. But he was at home. And then it seemed to him he would give all his years to be back in his father's shop again, in that small clean quiet shop. The street in New York seemed the cleanest, best street in the world, and he thought with utter longing of the white clean tub in the bathroom above the shop. He turned and walked back swiftly to his cabin and he sat down and wrote a letter. But it was not to his father and his mother. It was to Ruth Kin, and he said, " You were right and I am but a fool. Stay by your home there. You were very right." And grimly he went on day by day up that great river until it wound small and deep and narrow among the gorges, and so at last he came to where he had been sent.

Time and time again he wrote to Ruth Kin, and why he did not know, since she did not care for him.

TODAY AND FOREVER

But it seemed to him that now forever his country was lost. It was not what he dreamed, and not being that, it was nothing. He learned to bicker with the dealers to whom his cousin sent him, to suspect falseness in every bit of pottery or bronze they brought him, to know a poor man who pretended to be a farmer bringing in a bit of something he had unearthed from his field might be as great a liar as another. He learned to twist his tongue to speak their languages, to hold to his money, to haggle, and to postpone and do all the paltry business he must do. At night, lying in his bed, he sneered at himself that he had come to this, he who would not work for his father, but must follow dreams for thousands of miles and come to this, this sorry quarrelling search. And so he wrote to Ruth, not because he asked anything of her, so he said, but because he must write somewhere and he could not write his father and he would not write his friends and let them know he was so shamed.

"For filth and flies and beggary," he wrote to Ruth Kin, "I have not seen the like of this country. Yes, I suppose this is my country. And here in my country I must watch daily or I am robbed, and here in my country men are kidnapped and nothing is said. And——"

And so he poured out all his bitter disappointment and his shames, and eased himself a little, although he never ate a meal without a fuss about the dust upon the table or flies upon the meats, so that in that whole city he got a name for himself, and the inn dreaded to see him coming, and he was nicknamed the Foreign Devil, since he was so full of fuss about a little dust and dirt or about a fly or two.

Then like a sharp cold wind across the sea one day he had a letter, sent to his cousin and his cousin sent it on, and it was from Ruth Kin. He had come back to his inn at night after a long day of searching in a newly opened ruin, and there upon his table the letter lay. He opened it and found the inner envelope and opened that and read, like Ruth's voice, her laughing pitiless truthful words. "You sap," she wrote, and whereas once he hated such speech, he only laughed now aloud — it seemed so good to have a word come hard and direct against his cheek — oh, how he was weary of the false polite palavering of the dealers ! "You sap, what did you expect ? For a penny I'd come — not to marry you, you understand, but just to see if it's what you say. And I'd like to sort of clean things up if it is as bad as you say."

HIS OWN COUNTRY

Looking out of his window, down the narrow, crowded street, he knew that he did not want Ruth Kin to come. It was evening in August, and the end of a hot day, and the people were quarrelsome. Their voices rose sharply and angrily into his window. Two women were cursing each other, and there was a crowd about them, listening, to hear and to be amused. Suddenly one snatched at the other's hair, and they rolled in the dust, their curses shrieking. But it was a common sight after all, and the people moved and scattered and brought out their bamboo beds and spread their pallets for the night. Men and women and children lay down to sleep, the men stripped near to nakedness, the children naked, and the women in their thin grass-cloth coats. Above them rose the hum of mosquitoes. He stood looking down on them. A child wailed through the dusk and a dog howled. These, these were his people. He did not want Ruth Kin to come.

TODAY AND FOREVER

He went back into the room and lit the small kerosene oil lamp and sat down to answer her letter. The night insects fluttered about him, and twice he got up and stepped upon the body of a centipede and felt its crusty body crack beneath his American leather shoe. He wrote and wrote, and, pausing at last, he added one more line, "Even the kerosene lamp," he wrote, "is American. You had better stay in America." He went to bed exhausted and silent to the heart. There, he thought, having told her everything, there was the end of Ruth Kin.

There was no going back, of course. He was far too proud to go back. After all these years, after he had organized the Chinese boys' patriotic club in his high school and after he had collected money in college to send to the revolutionary government, after everything he had dreamed, there was no going back. He settled himself grimly to his own country. Once he went to the new capital and walked silently and unknown about the streets. He had, he realized, expected to see something like New York, like Washington, like the postcards he had seen of Paris. Instead he saw a few carelessly made wide streets, fringed by new cheap one-storey shops. There were two or three large buildings, new and half empty. When he walked up the steps, a guard stopped him sternly, and he turned and went away. Perhaps if he had had influence he might have gone in, but he had no influence at all. He walked a long way outside the city and came to the grave of the hero of the revolution and stood staring at it. The grave was there, enormous, hideous, new, a treeless scar upon the mountain side, and inside it the hero lay dead. He went away again.

HIS OWN COUNTRY

Once he begged a holiday from his cousin and went south to the village of his mother's girlhood, travelling by small rat-ridden steamers and at last by wheelbarrow across the flat fertile fields. It was the last stronghold of his dreams. But when he slipped off the vehicle a dog rushed at him savagely, and though he beat the beast off, he had to watch, and so sidling and wary he came to the village. Yet what was it but a village after all? It was a small cluster of houses made from brick of the field earth, and the people were like all the country people he had seen. They were quite the same, the men suspicious of his foreignness and the women silent and shrinking away. A narrow filthy street, a dirty tea shop or two, the smell of human waste upon the fields for fertilizer, the silent staring girls — he did not even wait to search out his kin. If these were his kin, then let him not know it. He turned and shouted to the wheelbarrow-pusher, "Let us go away!" he shouted. "I want to go away at once!"

Shaking along over the cobbled country roads, he said to himself he was very glad he had written so to Ruth Kin. He was very glad he had told her she must stay there where she was and marry George Liu and live in a little clean flat and have an electric stove and ice and cleanness — and cleanness — and cleanness — everywhere.

Then how could he have been prepared for Ruth Kin's letter in Shanghai? It came after three months across the thousands of miles. He almost felt its briskness through the envelope. The paper was crisp beneath his fingers, used now to the soft thin paper of his cousin's ledgers. The letter crackled when he opened it, the words leaped out, incredible, lively, determined words. He could see her snapping eyes, hear her laugh, see her slight straight saucy figure, see her tossing hair. "Well, I'm coming, John Dewey Chang," the letter began straightly. "I've changed my mind. You've got me — I guess the old home town needs me — and you do, too——"

TODAY AND FOREVER

This was her letter. A little news, a joke or two — "George Liu has gone and married the girl at the soda fountain — I always knew he wasn't smart ! Anyway, my folks have stopped ragging me," and at the end, "I've got my ticket and I'll be along in a week after you get this. My dad's coming on business. You're my business." At the end, in a small squeezed note he read with difficulty, "You can have the ring ready — if you want to——"

He folded the letter in a daze. All these days she had been coming toward him, and he had not known ! Straight as wind and ship and day and night could bring her she was coming. And for the moment his first thought was he did not know what to do with her. He had a frantic feeling that he must clean everything up before she came. He was suddenly ashamed of everything, ashamed of dirt and poverty and silent ignorant women and of his fat cousin and of the inn and of this room. He ran to the mirror and looked into it. Yes, he was ashamed of himself, too. He had let his hair grow long and unkempt and he wore a soiled shirt. He looked as he would not have dreamed of letting himself look in New York. It did not seem worth while to be different — until now. But now — now — what could he possibly do in a week ?

But after all, he did everything in a week — that is, nearly everything. In this country of his, he determined, there should be one spot, a little single spot, clean and homelike for Ruth Kin and him. He rushed to his cousin and borrowed money of him extravagantly. "An American girl?" said the cousin suspiciously, breaking into the words pouring out of John Dewey Chang's lips.

HIS OWN COUNTRY

"Certainly not," John Chang said. And then suddenly he paused and thought, "A sort of an American girl," and did not say it, knowing his cousin. His cousin would not lend money on an American girl, and so he shook his head. After all, Ruth Kin was not an American.

With the money he rented a little house, not in the Chinese city where the inn was and where his cousin lived and where the shop was, but a little bungalow on the edge of the foreign concession where the Americans lived. He must spare his Ruth what he had had — the sudden death of dreams. There was a little banksia rose growing over the porch and even in this autumn it put forth a few blossoms. In spring it would be a bouquet of fragrance for them. In the court there was even an oleander tree. The little house had been long empty, and he hired a stout serving-woman from his cousin to come and scrub and clean, and then among the foreign shops he searched for things for Ruth, a rug, two chairs, a bed, a table, some dishes, curtains at the window, and some pictures. At the last moment he remembered pictures and he ran to a shop on Avenue Edward VII and bought three pictures of mountains and lakes, brightly coloured.

Then almost at once he had to hurry, for Ruth's ship would be at the dock in an hour.

It was, he felt, waiting, impossible that Ruth was coming to this dock. He could not imagine it. He felt newly sensitive when he looked about, as though he were responsible for the ragged coolies, for the vendors outside the palings, with their small baskets of dirty sweetmeats. A few well-dressed white people were standing there also, and he hated them for their cleanliness and their smartness. He saw gratefully two pretty Chinese girls with their mother and a maidservant, dressed in long satin robes. At least there were these. Somewhere, perhaps, hidden behind high walls there were many such people. Sometimes one saw them on the street. Among the great mass of noisy hungry common folk they were as though there were none, being so few. But at least today there were these, and Ruth would see them. She would feel strange — of course she would feel strange. He must let her see it all gradually and not be discouraged. He was glad that there was electricity in the little house.

TODAY AND FOREVER

Then almost before he knew it the ship had bumped the dock and the gangway was thrown and there was Ruth! He ran forward and she took his hand and held it and he stared down at her unbelieving.

"Here's Dad," she reminded him, laughing, and he bowed to the stout old figure behind her. "I have letters from your father and mother," she said, but it did not matter to him. He took the letters she held out to him from her hand-bag, and stared on at her. She was prettier than ever, but how foreign! In her little trim blue suit she looked wholly American until he saw her face.

She gazed with interest about her. "Queer," she said, "this doesn't seem funny to me — none of it. I've never seen any of it, but it's just as though I had!"

HIS OWN COUNTRY

Beyond the customs and the dock he called to a taxicab, but she laid a swift hand on his arm. "Let's ride in those funny little things," she cried, pointing to a ricksha. "Taxis are so common!"

So in a moment they were gliding along the Bund behind panting coolies. She turned and waved her hand at him, smiling in delight, "It's more fun than a picnic," she cried.

Well, there it was. A week later, settled in the small house with the banksia rose, he was more astonished at her than ever. For some change had crept over her, already, some indefinable, softening change. In New York she had been as slangy and sharp as a little gamin. But here in this house on the edge of the Chinese city the sharpness was leaving her. She was more silent, and the slang in which she used to take such pride because it was American was day by day becoming more rare. He was dismayed. To himself he thought, "She's growing to hate it. She's feeling as I did — disappointed. It's all worse than she thought."

"Where's all the dirt and the poor you used to write about?" she asked once.

He was frightened. "I was too particular, I guess," he said, evading her, and hurried on. "Ruth, the oleander's going to bloom."

For once he had said to her that he chose his own country always, whether she were there or not. Now, knowing what it was to have her by him in the day, across the table from him when he ate, and when the deep of night came, knowing her warmly in his arms, he knew that if she did not choose this country it was no longer his own. No country could be his where she was not. Suppose she was wanting to go back to New York, just now when this little house began to seem home to him, just now when he could look about him on the streets and not have his heart full, because at the end of the day there was this home!

TODAY AND FOREVER

For having this centre now, this place to which he might come when his work was done, this clean bright spot, changed his whole country. He could come and go in narrow streets whose gutters ran with filth, he could bear blind and maimed beggars, he could bear ignorance and haggling dishonesty, knowing that he had a home. At night he could come back to Ruth and read and talk and listen to the phonograph and maybe go to a picture show, although he liked better just to hear her talk and laugh.

But here she was, growing daily less merry. "I've got to get her out into the foreign concession more," he thought desperately one night. "It's more like New York there." Aloud he said, "Like to go to a cabaret, honey?" They still talked in English together, since her Chinese was so little yet. They made a joke of their Chinese at first, she asking what this was and this. But now she had been picking up words from her servant-woman, and then she asked him by the end of the second week to buy a primer — "the kind that the kids use in school," she explained — and then she wanted a tutor and he had to hire an old scholar to come and teach her how to hold the brush for writing. So they had gone to the cabaret and danced a little, but not much. And she had not seemed to enjoy it especially, after all, although it had cost him a great deal of money, nearly five dollars. It was not a thing to be done often.

HIS OWN COUNTRY

By the end of the second month she looked at him sidewise one morning at breakfast and asked him, "What would you say if I quit wearing these New York clothes and put on things like the rest of the women here?" He stared at her. He could not imagine her in a narrow smooth-fitting robe. Her face seemed made for these little ruffy dresses she had brought with her. "Well," he began, when she broke in—— "Wait—don't say until you've seen me!"

That very night when he came home there she was. She had gone out and bought herself a long green robe of a close-woven silk. The collar was high. She had smoothed down her short hair, and above the straightness of the robe her little round face stood like a grave, pretty flower. She moved gravely, gracefully. Her very smile was changed. It was not saucy and teasing. He could not imagine this demure creature making eyes at a grocery man on the street. He gazed at her entranced. "Like it?" she said softly.

"Yes," he answered, and could say no more for watching her. Later, after their dinner, he asked with difficulty, fearing her answer, "Does that—dress—feel strange?" She looked up from some sewing she was doing. "No," she said. "The queer thing is I feel as if I'd never had my own clothes on until now."

But still, he told himself, coming and going every day to his cousin's shop, still the house shielded her. Her life was not hard. In the clean little house upon a macadam street, she need not see the other streets. He came and went every day in the native city, but she could go the other way into the foreign concession and see great shops and motor-cars. He talked a little, guardedly, about famines and bandits and wars in the interior, but she was not much interested. Such things were as remote from this place, seemingly, as they had been from Mott Street. She never read English newspapers and could not read the Chinese ones yet, and the little house bounded her life. He breathed the relief that this thought brought to him. He was keeping her safe and happy, secure from the knowledge of the dark native city. Really, he thought, she lived almost as she might have in an American city, as safe from sorrowful truth. He came home to her and rested in that haven, shut away from the real world. When sometimes she spoke of some chance sight — one morning there was a little dead girl baby thrown out even upon the macadam street — he coaxed her thoughts away. So in the end she was only gay when he came home, gay and demurely seductive. It came to him, as a miracle, that somehow Ruth Kin was often like that girl of whom he had dreamed, that sweet obedient woman in his house.

TODAY AND FOREVER

Then the knowledge he would have spared her came flooding down on her, flooding at the very time when he would most have kept it away. For she was going to have a baby, "a son," she said confidently. Now it appeared why she had wanted to wear a robe instead of the tight little American dresses. "As soon as I knew," she said, "I thought I'd like to wear them." Under the pretty, straightly clinging robe her figure rounded softly and with continued grace. And now he knew he must keep her safe in the world he had made for her, this safe, clean little modern world set in the midst of the huge dark old medieval country which was his. He hurried home from his work, hurried through the packing of cases and the shipping of goods to his father in Mott Street. More than ever now he must work to keep that little spot safe and sheltered.

HIS OWN COUNTRY

And then, one morning, one spring morning, when their son was seven months known to them and they were planning his birth and he had chosen the very best foreign hospital in the British concession, they heard the crack of cannon. The deep roar burst, reverberated and ceased, roared and reverberated and ceased. He stared at Ruth and she stared back, astonished, questioning. He knew instantly what it was. He had not taken time to read the papers much of late, but the air had been thunderous with it — the Japanese were at the coast. The cannon burst out again and there was the sound of a falling wall, and they leaped from their seats. But he thought of Ruth, only of Ruth. "Never mind," he cried, and forgetting he spoke in his own tongue — it was natural to him now to speak in his own tongue. "You are not to be frightened — I will take care of you somehow——" Oh, that he had never brought her here — oh, that they were back in Mott Street, where she might be safe and their child born in peace!

For soon, in a day, in two days, there was nothing left to hide from Ruth. The streets were full of terrified, wretched people, begging for a bit of shelter. Fire leaped everywhere, to the west of them. He had to spend his days and nights moving the stores of curios into the cellars of friendly houses of business in the foreign concessions. For a day and a night he had to work, not knowing what was become of Ruth, except that the little low house was safer, still, he felt, than any other spot. He watched the fire as he came and went. No, those flames were still safely away. He rushed home at dawn dreading to find Ruth terrified, ill, perhaps even in premature birth.

TODAY AND FOREVER

But when he opened the door she was not there. Instead it seemed as though all the folk in the city from whom he had been guarding her had taken the little house. Upon the rugs he had bought sat packed a crew of men and women and children, little precious bundles upon their knees, their faces haggard with bewilderment and fear and weariness. The house reeked with the odour of their unwashedness. They looked up at him mutely, timidly, silent in the din of the unceasing cannon in the west. Three days and three nights the roar had gone on, punctuated by the crash of the falling buildings a half-mile away. But the small low house had still stood sturdily, full of those homeless folk, squeezing into every corner, clutching their poor saved possessions. The room was full of them. He rushed to the kitchen to find the maidservant to demand where Ruth was.

And there she was, standing over the little electric range he had bought with such pride, pots on every spot of its surface. She was desperately weary as he could see, her hair uncombed. But her eyes were not tired. They were elated and exalted. Over her robe was a big American apron, and she and the woman stood stirring the pots of food.

"What——?" he began.

"They are all hungry," she said, "they're starved. The poor things have run away because their houses are burned down."

"We can't feed them all," he began.

She stirred vigorously. "We can, too!" she said. "I've got enough here for everybody."

HIS OWN COUNTRY

He stood uncertainly. "There's an awful smell in the house," he said suddenly. The smell of the unwashed crowd was coming even here, overcoming the fragrance of the rice. It was so vile he was ashamed for them before Ruth. He had never told her how the reek of the garlic-eating common folk sickened him, and now he must speak of it first.

She turned on him indignantly. "You ought to be ashamed of yourself," she cried, and then in pure New York, "You great big stiff, what does it matter how they smell if they're your own people?" She removed a pot rapidly and began filling bowls set out on the table. "Gee, if I'd known all I've learned since you've been away——" She dipped, competently, carefully, all the languor about her gone. She was electric with vigour. But he only saw her face, weary but perfectly happy.

"I didn't want you to know," he said. "If they do anything to hurt you now when the baby is about to come I shan't forgive them."

She paused in her dipping to stare at him. "Do you mean to tell me, John Dewey Chang," she demanded, "that you've been deliberately hiding things from me? I've wondered why every time we went anywhere you always took me into the foreign concession. That's just like New York — why, I've been bored to death!"

She dipped again, bowl after bowl, filling them to the brim, running to the stove for another pot.

"Bored?" he repeated.

"Yes," she answered. "There's nothing to do—— And all the time there were all these people I didn't know about——"

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Millions of them," he muttered, "millions upon millions upon millions of them!" He could not understand her.

"Well, that settles it," she said contentedly.

"Settles what?" he asked stupidly.

"Settles whether I like it here or in New York."

He stared at her, still stupidly, and she laughed at him, her old shout of loud laughter. He had not heard it just like that since that morning when she was working on her father's ledgers in Mott Street. "Silly!" she said, beginning on the fresh pot, "don't you see? I like to do things, and here's plenty!"

He began to comprehend. She did not mind these people. She was not in the least disappointed in them. They were only hungry people and she wanted to feed them. If they were dirty——

Almost as though she answered his thought she began, "And when they're all fed, I'm going to begin giving the babies baths—and maybe the grown people can take turns——" She turned around to demand, "How long do you think the war will keep up?"

Why, she was a child, nothing but a child, talking about baths! The sound of cannon was thundering steadily across the city. This morning the forts were down, he had heard. What would be the end of it?

"I don't know," he groaned.

"We might get everybody bathed if it only lasts long enough," she planned.

But he interrupted her, "Oh, Ruth, you should—you should go away for the baby's sake—out of the country—there's no telling about this war——"

But at this she turned and put her hands on her hips.

HIS OWN COUNTRY

"My baby?" she said, firmly. "My baby is going to be born in his own country where he belongs." Then her voice changed again. "Now," she commanded him, "you take this trayful in and begin to feed them — the kids first. And hurry!" she added, "there's a lot to do around here!"

Tiger! Tiger!

WITHOUT opening her eyes, Molly Chu knew it was time for her to get up. It was nearly midday. Upon the old square-tiled floor of her room she heard the soft tip-tap of her little maid's footsteps bringing in tea and sweetmeats for her to eat before she got up. She lay a moment longer. She was suddenly very hungry for a good American breakfast, the sort she had eaten every morning at college. The American air was sharp and cold, and she had always been hungry. She let herself think about it, dish by dish, the orange juice, oatmeal and cream, bacon and eggs, toast and coffee — ah, the good coffee! She could smell it, fragrant and hot in her nostrils.

"Shall I pour the tea?" Orchid's voice was a soft whisper. Here in this house where Molly was the only child no one ever waked her sharply. There were soft small sounds subdued to her gradual rousing. And then came Orchid's whisper. Her father had bought Orchid to be her bondmaid years ago, long before she could remember. Orchid was only two years older than she was, and she had waited four years for Molly to come back from America, and while she waited she embroidered the delicate silk undergarments that had made the American girls exclaim so loudly.

TIGER! TIGER!

"Oh, Molly, how wonderful — all those tiny stitches — that lovely design — oh, you lucky girl!"

She had only smiled, taking for granted Orchid's little stitches set so perfectly into flowers and birds and butterflies. When she was in America she could sometimes make herself grow a little homesick, seeing Orchid in a sunny corner of a courtyard at home, stitching. But she was never really homesick — there was so much to do in America. Oh, this idleness, now that college was over, now that she was home and there was nothing to do!

That was what her mother and father could never understand, what her friends could not understand, the girls she knew who had never gone away — how difficult to bear was the idleness.

She did not open her eyes. Why should she? It made no difference whether she got up or not. There was nothing to do in this quiet old seaport town in south China — nothing that mattered.

She felt Orchid's touch upon the silk-stuffed quilt.

"Your mother, little mistress — she wants you to go to the temple today with her. She said you were not to be waked, but when you woke yourself I was to tell you she is ready. Besides, I have brought you something. When you open your eyes you will see——" Orchid paused, waiting.

Orchid could make her feel a spoiled little girl again. She who had been honour student at Wellesley, president of the senior class — "You have a gift for executive work," the dean had told her — Orchid, coaxing her, made her feel wilful and pouting and naughty. She opened her eyes, and saw a great spray of small waxen yellow flowers.

"Spring!" Orchid cried joyously. She laid the leafless flower-laden branches upon the bed, and the canopy of silk bed-curtains was full of their fragrance.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Lamay flowers!" Molly cried, sitting up. "Oh, is the old bush in the bamboo court blooming?"

"Full!" said Orchid, smiling.

"I'd forgotten," Molly answered.

"I didn't tell you," Orchid said. "I waited until this morning, and I went out early. I knew yesterday that today the flowers would burst. This morning it stands a tree of gold!"

Spring! She leaped out of bed. When the lamay flowers bloomed the winter was over. Even though snow fell again, it was spring, and snow could not linger. The room was very cold. She warmed her hands over the bed of coals in the brazier. She had told her father again and again about the heat in American houses, how it was warm all winter and no one was ever cold, however high the snow was piled. These great old rooms with their tiled floors and plastered brick walls were like icehouses. She had been cold all winter.

"Ha!" her father said, swaddled in silk quilted robes, "those American houses! I should die. Put on more clothes, Ma-li." But she had said petulantly, "I won't go around looking like a bedding roll." It didn't matter — spring was here.

She washed herself quickly in the hot scented water in the brass ewer, shivering a little as the steam rose from her bare flesh, and while she dressed she drank the hot tea. Orchid had put the spray of golden flowers into a green glazed jar and she kept looking at it as she ate and drank.

It must be those flowers, she thought, which made her so restless and impatient today. She was ashamed of herself. Something in her hurried her feet, her speech, everything she did. She even wanted to hurry her mother.

TIGER! TIGER!

"Now then, Ma-li," her mother was saying, "have we everything? The incense, the silver shoes to burn, the gift to the temple, the fowls, my water-pipe, my kerchief — Orchid, does the wind blow? If it blows, I must have my little toilet-case to mend myself before I pray — perhaps I had better have it anyway. The tea-basket, Orchid, is it in the sedan? And some little cakes, lest we should be hungry — the ones made with vegetable oil, not lard, out of deference to the gods — the gods smell lard so quickly, you know, daughter, and it is so offensive to them. I always say the reason I lost your brother as soon as he was born was because I had eaten porkballs that day I went to worship — the day before his birth it was, and the gods smelled my breath——"

It was silly to be impatient with her chattering pretty little mother, swaying about on her small bound feet. She loved her mother and everybody loved her. But she thought, suddenly rebellious, "I'm tired — tired — tired of going to temples and hearing her talk all this nonsense!" She helped her mother into the sedan and said sharply, "Now, Mother, I've told you there is no truth in those silly old gods!"

"Hush!" her mother cried. "Don't! You don't know what spirits there are in the air!" Her mother's small round face grew piteous.

"Now, Mother!" she said practically. "In America——"

"They have their own gods, haven't they?" her mother asked. "Each country has the gods that come out of its own winds and waters and earth."

TODAY AND FOREVER

"I'm not afraid of any of them," said Molly, and fastened down the screen in front of her mother's face, which was to hide her from staring crowds. No lady in Changchow would think of riding exposed through the streets — no lady whose husband was the son of the richest and oldest family, that is. But little Madame Chu pushed the curtain aside an inch to say emphatically to her tall strong daughter, "When you are in America you need not fear our gods. But when you come home again, you come back to their power." Then she closed the curtain and called to the bearers, "Go!" and they swung the poles to their shoulders.

In her own closed sedan Molly sat upright. What if those American college mates of hers saw her now? At Commencement last June they had clung to her in their affectionate way to which she tried to respond, though she had been taught not to touch flesh to flesh, and they had shouted to her in their fresh loud young voices, "Write to me, Molly!" "Say, Molly, if I take a world tour I'll stop in China and see you. I'm crazy to see your house."

"Do let me know," she had said, "do please come to see me."

Well, she was not in the least ashamed of her house. Not even the college halls were more stately than the old house where generations of her family had lived. Of course if any of them really came to see her she would simply tell her father plainly that Americans would not understand his spitting where he liked. And if they did not come in winter they would not know how bitterly cold it was. Quaint, that is what they would call it, the spreading roofs, the tiled courtyards with their little pools and dwarfed trees. And she would not tell them what they did not see — the kitchen with its old earthen stoves and servants' children running about with dirty faces, the flies — she did not go there herself. The servants took care of things. And she loved the house, though its peace irked her. The house had stood three hundred years, and it would stand forever.

TIGER! TIGER!

Sometimes her father would say mournfully, "Nothing lasts any more — a man cannot build his house forever as the ancients did. Some day the Japanese will come."

When he said this she was always afraid, just for a moment, even though he had said it again and again as long as she could remember. "The little black dwarfs," the children shrieked on the streets in their quarrels, "the little black dwarfs will get you." Or they shrieked, "The Tiger will come down out of the hills and eat you!" The Japanese and the Tiger — the Japanese had been the gnomes in her childhood fairy-tales, the pixies, the wicked elves, and the Tiger had been the wicked giant. When she outgrew the fairy-tales, they all ceased to be real. Besides, there had been a nice Japanese girl in college — Chiyo her name was. They had not been friends exactly. She was short and dark and rather ugly, like a gnome. But they had not been enemies. Many girls liked Chiyo. And as for the Tiger, he was only an old bandit chieftain whom people talked about and nobody ever saw. Besides, there weren't supposed to be bandits any more. The government had made a law against them.

She stared severely out of the small pane of glass sewed into the cloth curtain. If her father would only go to Shanghai to live they could rent a foreign house and have foreign furniture and central heating. Shanghai was fun. Shanghai was exactly like America. But when she said she wanted to live there, her father only rumbled up his big fat laugh out of himself. "I have always lived here," he said amiably, as if that was enough, and then he said peaceably, "Don't worry yourself, child. You'll be marrying soon, and you can make your husband take you to Shanghai. I'm too old, and much too fat. What would I do in Shanghai?" He was always talking of her marrying, and she would not listen to it. She had cried, "But what can I do here?"

TODAY AND FOREVER

He opened his eyes at her.

"Why should you do anything?" he said and smiled. When she opened her mouth to argue he heaved himself up by his hands on his fat knees and waddled away.

"It's disgraceful of Father to be so fat," she thought angrily. Through the few square inches of glass she saw a rectangle of the crowded cobbled street, a segment of coolies pushing wheelbarrows, of trotting donkeys loaded with rice-bags, of children gambling with pennies, scuffling in the windy dust. There were not even rickshas in Changchow and not a single automobile. There wasn't a street wide enough for an automobile. Besides there was so many humped bridges over the canals. She was tilted sharply backward now as the bearer trotted up the steps of a bridge, and for a moment the square of glass held only blank sky. Then she was thrown forward, and the square was full of wet cobbles for another moment before she was righted and swinging along the street again.

"Father!" she thought bitterly. "The only thing he thinks of is getting me married. Why did he send me to America?"

TIGER! TIGER!

Once she had asked her father why, but he only drew on his pipe and shook his head.

"For no special reason," he said. "I thought it would be interesting to know some of the things they do and I had no son to send. Now," he said with immense enthusiasm, "tell me again about those airplanes. You say they rise up like kites, only——"

She spent hours telling him about America. "Not," she thought, "that it does any good. He only wants to be entertained. I am an honour graduate of a fine Western college for modern women, so that I can entertain a fat old man in a little idle seaport on the coast of China!"

She felt herself being lowered with a bump to the ground, and then Orchid was drawing aside the curtain.

"We are here, little mistress," she said and put out her hand to help her rise. But Molly leaped briskly to her feet.

"I don't need your help," she said brusquely.

Her mother was already out, "fussing," she thought, "over the stuff."

"Now then, Orchid!" her mother was crying. "Where is the — oh, there it is? Where is my handkerchief? What — oh yes, I put it in my sleeve. And — oh, here is the good abbot!"

The abbot was hurrying down the steps, smiling and rubbing his plump hands, his grey robes flying in the wind. She hated him. Her mother could never see how greedy his eyes were and how cruel his mouth, and how repulsive his hands, so soft and fat. They were bowing and bowing — of course the abbot was glad to see a rich, foolish old lady.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"This morning when I rose from my prayers," the abbot was smirking, "I saw the lamay tree in full bloom and I knew the day held luck. And luck is come."

He led the way into the temple, and she followed behind her mother, sturdy and contemptuous, her American shoes clacking on the dirty marble steps. Behind her came Orchid and the bearers with the gifts, and all around them were eager curious faces, dishevelled hair, staring eyes. They were the crowd of the poor, pressing forward. She never looked at them and she did not look at them now. She had never in all her childhood, sheltered behind the high walls of her father's house, even spoken to them. She followed her mother into the high shadowy temple halls, and the too sweet smell of burning incense fell about her like swathes of tissued silk. She could scarcely breathe.

"Go away," her mother said to her. "I want to pray for a private thing." She had stood waiting while her mother prayed her long usual prayers, for health and good crops for the ancestral farm and that the Japanese would never come and that the Tiger would leave them alone. For years her mother had prayed for these things.

"Go away," her mother repeated.

So she had gone away to a little distance. There was no question of her own praying. They had had that out when she first came home.

"I'll go to the temple with you, Mother, but I will never get down on my knees again to those old images," she had declared. That was the day when her mother had come to give thanks for her safe return.

TIGER! TIGER!

"Oh, you wicked, wicked girl!" her mother had wailed, and then she had turned to her husband. "The gods will be angry at us all!" she wailed.

"Not if you don't tell them about it," he said jokingly. "I haven't been to the temple for years, and they don't know it." He leaned forward and patted her shoulder. "Besides, they wouldn't hurt anybody belonging to you after all these years."

"I suppose not," she said.

And afterwards Molly had said to her father, "Don't you believe in the old gods, Father?"

He shook his head and whispered, "Don't tell on me!" And then he had waddled to one of his bookshelves and pulled out a small paper-bound book and said, "I read this many years ago." To her wonder it was a translation of Darwin's Origin of Species. She had never thought of him as reading anything except old novels and odes. "Your mother has to have gods," he said. "You and I don't."

A flicker of understanding passed between them. She lost it again when he coughed loudly and spat, she lost it over and over when he sat sleepy from too much food and drink, when he stretched himself on a couch and slept away his time uselessly. "How can he waste himself so?" she thought, half sad, half angry. And then when she told him about something she had seen in America, he would be suddenly alert and know what she meant, and for a little while there would be the flicker between them.

"There is nothing to make anybody do anything in this sleepy old city," she thought irritably. From a wing of the temple came the drone of chanting priests, slow and somnolent, the chant of centuries. She could not bear it. She went and stood by the great open temple door, where she could look out.

TODAY AND FOREVER

The huge courtyard was full of vendors, selling vegetarian cakes, incense, paper money, and cooked foods for sacrifice. It was dirty and crowded and noisy. And then, suddenly, the spring wind caught her. It blew fresh and sweet from the hills beyond the city wall, chill but not cold. The sky over the dark tiled city roofs was bright blue with small white clouds racing across it. "I can't — I can't —" she thought passionately, "I can't stay here all my life and grow like all of the rest of them!"

It was at this moment that she heard Orchid cough behind her and she turned quickly. Orchid was smiling a little foolishly.

"What is it?" Molly asked her sharply. "Why are you laughing?"

"Do you know what your mother is praying for, little mistress?" Orchid asked mischievously.

"No," said Molly shortly, "it is not my business."

"I think it is your business," said Orchid, laughing. "She is praying for a husband for you!"

Molly stared at her. A husband — for her——

"Be quiet!" she said. "Be quiet, you silly girl!"

"Yes, mistress," said Orchid docilely. But in her eyes was the contented look of one who has said what she came to say.

She did not ask her mother anything. Her mother came to her when she still stood by the temple door and her eyes were calm and her voice was refreshed.

"It is a good day for prayer," she said. "I felt today that the god leaned down to hear me and when I had asked I knew it was given. Let us go home."

She saw in her mother's eyes a gleam that she recognized. It meant her mother was planning something.

TIGER! TIGER!

"If Mother thinks I'll marry someone she chooses," she thought, "she's wrong. She'll tell me the gods chose, probably."

They entered their waiting sedans again, and she looked away from the greasy abbot, bowing and bowing as they went away.

She would not ask her mother anything. No, when she reached home she would go straight to her father. "Father," she would demand of him — all the people in the street were only shadows moving across the square of glass — "Father, I won't—I won't marry anybody. I won't marry any man unless——" Over and over she thought what she would say to him. They were home almost instantly, it seemed to her.

"Where is my father?" she demanded of the manservant who had come to meet them at the gate.

"He is asleep in the library," he answered, and she flew through the courtyards.

But when she reached the library he was not at all asleep. She heard his heavy voice rumbling in talk, and she opened the door impetuously. Three old men sat there, tea-bowls before them. She knew them. They were the city elders. But they were not drinking tea. They were leaning forward, their heads close together, whispering. When she came in they looked at her, and then her father rose to his feet.

"Ma-li, I was about to send for you," he said. "Where is your mother? You are both to leave at once for Shanghai — quickly — as quickly as you can."

"Why — why —?" she stammered. But he was pushing her by the shoulders through the door.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"The Tiger!" he whispered. "The Tiger is going to attack the city!"

He stared at her with terror in his eyes. "As though it were not enough," he said, swallowing hard, "as though it were not enough that there is Japan glowering off our coasts, we must have the Tiger tearing at us from within!"

Then he closed the door.

She stood a moment, shut out, commanded like a child. The Tiger! Her father was really afraid. It was ridiculous. She had heard about the Tiger all her life. There was always the Tiger whom the people had feared. He lived off in the mountains to the east, a chief over twenty thousand bandits. The city paid him yearly sums to leave them alone, she knew that. She had heard her father talk about "Tiger Tax." Everybody paid Tiger Tax and was glad to do it if they were left in peace. The little towns too poor to pay had stories to tell of boisterous furies of bandits pouring through their gates and swarming into houses and shops. When he had gone they put placards on their city gates. "Pass — we have already been robbed," they wrote. "We have nothing left." That was in case other robber bands came by, such as the Blue Wolf band, for instance, though the Blue Wolf was supposed to stay on the lee side of the mountain. But nobody was so afraid of the Blue Wolf as they were of the Tiger. Everybody had hoped for the old Tiger to die until the Tiger's son grew up, and then there was no use in hope, for he was twice as strong as his father had been and twice as clever, everybody said, though nobody had seen him.

TIGER! TIGER!

She stood, remembering all this talk she heard from servants and from Orchid. She thought of America suddenly with envy and longing. And then she was very angry. "It's perfectly outrageous!" she thought, "in this day and time, that we still have to suffer from these war-lords, at least. I'd be ashamed to have the girls in college even dream of it." She had laughed once in answer to a question Mary Lane, reading a newspaper, had asked her. "War-lords? Oh no, we don't have war-lords any more in China!" She had not even thought of the Tiger in America.

She stamped her foot and opened the door of the library. All the old men looked at her. Her father was writing on a sheet of paper. She knew what it was. He was counting up how much money they could gather to bribe the Tiger to leave them alone.

"Forty-seven thousand, I make it," he said without looking. "I'll add three thousand more and make it fifty. Fifty thousand — will he let us alone for that?"

"Father," she said loudly, "why do you give anything to a robber?"

He looked up at her, surprised.

"Why, we always have had to give to the Tiger," he said mildly. "The old one wasn't so bad — it's this young one. He has big ideas."

"And you're going to help him!" she cried.

The old men looked at her patiently. A woman, she could see them thinking, a woman understands nothing.

Her father rose to his feet.

"I tell you to go to your mother," he said. "I want you out of this. You've been begging to go to Shanghai. Well, go, and visit your cousins there and do that dancing they all love, and enjoy yourself."

TODAY AND FOREVER

"And leave you here?" she asked.

"I'm not a young girl," he said pointedly. And once more he took her shoulders and pushed her through the door. "Go away," he whispered loudly. "Don't you see you're making me ashamed before the city elders? Pretend at least to obey me!"

She went to her room and sat down, hot with anger. What a country was hers! Those gods in the temple this morning — silly old images of clay pasted over with coloured paper and gilt, silly ferocious faces to frighten the ignorant people — the abbot's fat open palm — sedan chairs instead of automobiles, and now a war-lord about to attack the city!

"I don't belong here," she cried passionately to herself. "It's a hideous country — it ought to be dead and buried with all the other medieval countries!" And then she thought, "What if Mary Lane should really come to visit me? Lots of people come to China now. I wish they wouldn't." And then she remembered her mother kneeling, too, before the silly gods. "My own mother," she thought, and her father, paying tribute to a war-lord — what were war-lords anyway but bandits? "They ought to be put in jail," she said aloud, and then she thought bitterly, "There probably isn't even a jail in the city." . . . "And I," she thought, "I have a degree from Wellesley! It's about as appropriate to me as an automobile would be to these streets." She clenched her fists. "I won't stand it," she decided, "I simply won't stand it." What, she asked herself, would Mary Lane have done? What would any girl do — any girl, that is, who lived today?

TIGER! TIGER!

She sat, plotting deeply. Across the swiftness of her thought she was barely aware of the sweet heavy fragrance of the lamay flowers upon their brown and leafless branches. The door opened and Orchid burst into the room.

"We must go to Shanghai, little mistress!" she cried. "We are all to go at once to Shanghai. It's the Tiger again! Your mother says I am to pack your robes at once."

Molly looked up at her mildly. "Very well, Orchid," she said gently, so gently that Orchid cried again in amazement, "Did you know? Aren't you afraid of the Tiger?"

Molly put out a finger and touched a waxen yellow flower. "I've been wanting to go to Shanghai," she murmured. "Besides, I'm not afraid of anybody."

"Oh!" Orchid breathed. "Then you are the only one who isn't!"

"Now!" she thought to herself, "now is the moment!" The rickety little coastal steamer had blown its last feeble tremolo of a whistle. A bustle of coolies was beginning to die away. Her father had already gone. "Good-bye — good-bye," he had called from the dock. They had bowed and waved, and he had turned away and entered his sedan and her mother said, "I am going straight to bed, Molly, and prepare myself. I shall be sick."

"Yes, Mother," she had replied. And then she had said exactly as she planned, "Orchid, you must go with her."

"Bring my small bag, Orchid," her mother called over her shoulder. And Orchid had taken up the little pigskin case of toilet things. All the bags were heaped on the deck. She had counted on that, too, because when the last moment came she would take Orchid's bundle of clothes, plain blue cotton clothes, tied up in a big flowered kerchief. This was the moment. A few last visitors were leaving by the gangplank that two sailors were waiting to draw. The ship was creaking a little, easing away from the dock a few inches.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Hurry — hurry!" the sailors shouted.

She stooped, picked up the bundle, and made herself one of the group. She followed them down the gangplank and into the street. Even if Orchid should be looking, she wouldn't think of this — she was glad she had put on her plainest robe this morning, a dark-blue thing. She melted into the crowded street, into the current, and turned. She was safe. No one could see her now. She stopped at a stand where sedans were for hire.

"How much for a day's ride?" she asked.

"A silver dollar, and what tea-money your good heart says," a stout fellow answered.

"I'll take it," she said. "And let the bearers be strong, because we go to the mountains."

"A temple, lady?" the stout fellow asked.

"No," she replied calmly, "to the Tiger's mountain."

There, she had said it aloud! The men looked at each other. They muttered, "The Tiger's mountain — that's not — no — nobody — we won't——"

"What is it?" she asked.

"No bearers can climb that mountain, lady," the stout fellow said solemnly. "We'd never get home again to our wives and children."

"You will get home again, I promise," she said.

TIGER ! TIGER !

They were staring at her. "Who are you, lady?" the stout fellow asked in a whisper. It was better not to speak of the Tiger aloud in a street.

"You had better take me without asking," she said coldly. "The Tiger——" she paused.

"Only to the foothills of the mountain," the man begged. "There are horses there, lady, used to the narrow paths, as you must know if you know the Tiger."

"The foot of the mountain, then," she said. Horses! She had ridden horses in America. They had hired horses sometimes at college on a holiday and ridden through the New England countryside, she and Mary Lane. Mary had taught her how to ride.

She seated herself in a sedan and drew the curtain.

"Go!" she commanded.

There was a moment of silence. Then she felt herself lifted into the air and into the long familiar swing of steps. She waited an hour and then behind the curtain she began to change her clothes, taking care not to move more than she could help. She drew on Orchid's loose blue cotton trousers, and slipped into her blue cotton coat. She had put on her stoutest American leather walking shoes this morning.

"Sit still, lady!" a bearer shouted. "When you move, the pole grinds our shoulders."

"I am only putting on more clothes," she called back. "The air is growing colder already."

It was true. The foothills were rising before them. She tied her own clothes firmly into Orchid's bundle. A moment later she felt the chair bump to the ground and she stepped out. Around her was strange country, sharp low hills rising like waves around the base of the great mountain. She was standing on a threshing-floor, a square of level yellow earth beaten out of the hillside. An earthen farmhouse stood at its edge, its back against the hill, and near it, tethered to a willow tree, were half a dozen horses. A sullen-looking farmer came to the door.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"What is the hire of a horse?" she asked quietly. She felt the bottom of her heart begin to quake a little with fear. She had never seen faces like those which now began to crowd about the door. She had lived in sunny walled courtyards.

"She is a friend of the Tiger's," the stout bearer whispered and jerked his thumb toward the crest of the mountain high above them.

"Why didn't you say so?" the sullen farmer asked. "You can't go alone, lady. The passes are narrow and there are wild beasts. I will go with you."

"Very well," she replied. She had ready in her hand the money for the bearers. She had taken it out of her purse while she was hidden behind the curtain so that they would not be tempted by the roll of bills which her father had given her. "Buy some new dresses in Shanghai," he had said. "Go to the theatre and have a good time." But they scarcely looked at the money. They seized it and swung the empty sedan to their shoulders and made off.

"Good-bye, lady," they called, thankful to be gone. She stood a moment, watching them run nimbly down the path. Her heart shook again in her breast. She was perhaps a fool.

"Lady, will you eat something before we go up the mountain?" a voice was asking. She turned and looked into a woman's face, thin and leathery brown. She had a bowl of hot rice gruel in her two hands. It was coarse brown rice with nothing to flavour it, but it smelled delicious. She was very hungry.

TIGER! TIGER!

"Thank you," she said and drank it, and dropping a coin into the empty bowl she set it down on the ground. The sullen man untied two squat strong ponies and led them forward. The saddles were soldiers' saddles, high and tasselled with bright silk. But when she had climbed up the seat was comfortable. The man had leaped up with one spring. He turned and looked at her.

"Ready," she said. By now her mother and Orchid would be frantic with fear because she was not to be found. But they could do nothing. The ship would be in open sea, and there was no turning back. There was no radio on that old tub, and so they could not wire her father until they reached Shanghai, two days from now. And in two days she would be home again — unless, that is . . .

The man said suddenly, "How long since you have been here, lady?"

"A long time," she said.

"Ah," he said, "I thought I hadn't seen you. But I've only been here a year. The old farmer died last spring."

She did not answer.

"You'll find the lair very different," he went on, "at least everybody says things are different now with the young Tiger. I don't know — is it the young one or the old one you know?"

"Both," she replied.

"Ah," he said curiously, "kin?"

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Yes," she said. She was lying beautifully. "But I do — I have known them, in a way, all my life," she thought, excusing herself.

They were crossing a narrow bridge, a slab of rough mountain rock thrown across a rushing green torrent, and she held her breath. The man was saying something, but his voice was lost in the roar. Then she was upon the open path again and his voice came loudly.

"— could be worse. The young Tiger is always just to those who are just to him."

"Just," she thought with contempt! She saw her father and the city elders, painfully counting up the Tiger Tax. But she did not answer. She went on planning quickly — she would say to him quite plainly, "I came to say to you——"

"Here is the gate," the man cried. He leaped from his horse and beat upon an iron-studded gate set in a high rocky wall. A little postern gate opened and a rough uncombed head was thrust through.

"Who is it?"

"A relative of the Tiger's," the man said.

"Relative!" the uncombed man cried. "Nobody told me——"

"I have come a long way," Molly said. She slipped from her horse and put a piece of money into her guide's hand. "Thank you," she said. "I will tell my cousin how courteous you have been to me." And before they knew what she was doing, she had pushed into the little gate.

"Tell my cousin I am here," she said. There was a bench by the wall, and she sat down.

"Who is your cousin, in the name of my mother?" the uncombed man demanded, astonished.

TIGER! TIGER!

"Why, the Tiger," she said, and looked at him and made her eyes bright above her quaking heart.

The man stared down at her. "Nobody told me you were coming," he said.

"Nobody knew it," she replied. "But here I am."

He stared at her again, scratched his head, and shambled away. She was left alone. The afternoon sun shone cloudlessly down into a great stone-floored court. At one side was the inner gate through which the man had gone. There was no other sign of life. She waited a long time. The man did not come back. Well, what she had planned she had done. She was alone on this mountain top, the Tiger's mountain. The horses were gone. It was mad — mad. She felt in her bosom. Yes, there it was, the little blue steel pistol. Her father had bought it once from a wandering American who was stranded and needed money. She had crept into the library last night and taken it out of the drawer of her father's desk. Was it only last night? Everything was a dream except this moment. She was sitting on a hard bench in a courtyard of the fortress the old Tiger had built for himself before she was born. "Out of the people's money," she thought; and tried to be angry. But she was beginning to be only afraid. Then suddenly the inner gate creaked and the man was back.

"The Tiger says, by his mother's name, he has no cousin." The man stopped to grin. "But he asked, were you good-looking." She looked up at him. "I said you were so-so," he said, "and he said you were to come in."

She put her hand in her bosom against the steel and followed him.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"I have to remember," she told herself, "that this is the year 1937, and that I am a graduate of Wellesley, and that — and that——"

She was crossing one courtyard after another. It was not so strange now. There were women and children staring at her, roughly clad, peasant-looking women, and rough staring men — but people. She was glad she had on Orchid's cotton clothes. She was following him now into a hall, a great empty hall. They crossed it, and he opened a door.

"Here she is," he said loudly, and she was in the room.

At a desk a tall man sat writing at a typewriter. He looked up and she saw a bold handsome young face.

"Sit down," he said, and to the serving-man he said, "Go away."

She sat down and put her bundle on the floor beside her. When the door was shut, the young man sat staring at her.

"Now tell me why you say you are my cousin when I have no cousin," he said.

He was the Tiger, and she knew it. But her heart was slowing now to its usual beating. She wet her dry lips and smiled. It had been as easy as that.

"I didn't expect to see a typewriter here," she said.

"There's something wrong with it," he said, frowning. "I have worked and worked on it — I very nearly gave it up and threw it over the precipice, it has made me so angry. But it's hard to get them, so I wanted to try once more."

"I used to do my papers on one in college," she said. "I'll look at it."

He did not speak while she rose and came over to him. He was dressed in a sort of plain dark uniform of woollen cloth, and his hands upon the keys were big and finely shaped.

TIGER! TIGER!

"Let me see," she said. "If you will get up——"

He leaped to his feet, and she sat down and studied the machine. Out of the corner of her eye she could see his feet in leather foreign shoes.

"Here is the trouble," she said. "The ribbon must go through this——" She adjusted it quickly and quickly typed off an English sentence — "Now is the time for all good men to come to the aid of the party."

"Do you know English?" he asked, astonished.

"I went to college in America," she replied, "and I used a typewriter all the time." She looked up and met his eyes gazing down delightedly into hers.

"I have an English book I have been trying to read," he cried. "I can't understand it — can you——"

"Of course I can," she said, smiling.

He reached into a drawer and pulled out a book.

"Explain it," he commanded her. It was by Karl Marx.

"Tigers," she thought, laughing to herself, "why should anybody be afraid of Tigers?"

"I understand the separate English words," he was saying plaintively, "but I can't understand what he means."

"It will take a long time to explain that," she said. "I'm afraid I can't stay long enough."

"Who are you?" he exclaimed. "Why are you here?"

"I came to see you," she said.

"Weren't you afraid?" he asked.

She wanted to say, "I wasn't in the least afraid."

TODAY AND FOREVER

But he had a nice face, an honest face. He was standing beside her, looking down at her, and his dark eyes were steady and good. So she said, "Yes, I was afraid." She put her hand into her bosom, about to take out the pistol and say, "I brought this along." But she did not. After all, he was still the son of the old Tiger. She said instead, "But I had to come for a special purpose."

"What purpose?" he asked. "You needn't be afraid any more."

"I am so hungry," she said. She was not sure now how to say what she had come to say. "I haven't eaten anything since I left the ship — except a bowl of rice."

"A ship?" he repeated. "Who are you? Tell me."

"It doesn't matter," she answered. "A daughter of the people in a city by the sea."

"I've never seen anybody like you," he said slowly. "Your clothes are rough like a bondmaid's, but — you are not a bondmaid. No, I won't let you go until you tell me."

She rose, but he put out his hand imperiously. "Everyone obeys me," he said.

She was fearfully aware of his firm hand on her dress. She drew away from it. After all, she did not know him. It was as well she had kept the pistol hidden. But she was not afraid of him. "He's only a man," she thought.

"I want to wash myself," she said, "and I am hungry."

"Will you promise to come back inside the hour?" he demanded.

She nodded.

"How am I to know if you will do it?" he asked.

TIGER! TIGER!

"I haven't told you why I came," she replied. "I shan't go away without doing that."

He smiled. "Quick wits," he said and clapped his hands. A manservant came to the door.

"Eh?" he shouted, putting in his head.

"Tell your woman to come here," the Tiger commanded. In a moment an old grey-haired woman was there.

"Take this lady to the rooms where my mother used to sleep," he told her. And he said to Molly, "My mother died last year, and my father has moved into another courtyard. You will be safe and at peace. She was a good woman and her spirit is still there. And I shall wait here until you come back."

He sat down again before the typewriter, and she picked up her bundle and followed the old woman. She did not feel in the least strange, she thought, amazed that it was so. The old woman pushed open a door and she stepped into a large quiet room that opened into another.

"Here," the old woman said, "here are the rooms. It's all clean. I clean them every day. I'll go and fetch hot water and food."

She closed the door, and Molly stood alone in the middle of a big square raftered room. The walls were of rough plastered mud, but the furniture was polished and fine, and the bed-curtains were of soft blue silk held back by clasps of gold. It was the private room of a lady. There were books in a case against the wall. She went to look at them. They were all old — old poetry, old philosophy, history. But it was strange that the woman who had lived here could even read. Her own mother could not read such books as these. "Who was she?" she thought. And then she thought, "And what sort of man would her son be?"

TODAY AND FOREVER

She was suddenly eager to be back with him. She wanted to know him, to find out. She began unbuttoning the coarse garments she wore. "I'm going to wear my own clothes," she thought quickly. She wanted him to see her as she really was. "I must be myself," she thought.

"You see," he was saying earnestly, "why I have to have money."

It was nearly noon of the next day, but she had lost all count of the hours. They had talked last night until he himself said, "You must go now to your rooms, lest these rude people gossip. I have told that old woman to sleep near you and serve you. She was my mother's bondmaid, and my mother, wanting her to be happy, married her to a farmer from the valley. But she was not happy living there and so she came back, bringing her husband with her to serve my father."

But she had not slept until nearly dawn, because the old woman began talking and telling her everything.

"You should have seen how it was in the old days," she began, sitting on the footstool by the bed when she had drawn the silken quilt over Molly's shoulders. "Those were the days of greatness. Every day the old Tiger's men went down into the cities by the sea and they brought back loads of all the things they could carry — silks and jewels and garments of all kinds and fine furniture and bedding and anything we wanted. Everyone was afraid of the Tiger then, and we lived like kings and emperors."

TIGER! TIGER!

"Isn't it the same now?" Molly asked quietly. For the first time all evening she remembered her father and the old city elders, gathering together the Tiger Tax. The old woman shook her head.

"The young Tiger reads books," she whispered. "That's no way for a war-lord. Swords and weapons, plots and sallies into the towns — that's what he ought to be doing." She leaned forward to whisper more softly. "It's his mother's fault. She taught him how to read. The old Tiger can't read."

"Who was she?" Molly whispered back.

"We don't know," the old woman replied. "A lady from some city — a lady the old Tiger saw and loved. She was a young girl when he brought her here and she did nothing but weep until her son was born, though the old Tiger gave her everything. I can't count on two hands the raids he made for all those fine things. He used to tell the men, 'Look for jade and pearls set in hair ornaments,' and he'd say, 'Bring back books for her.' You see all those books, and there are roomfuls beside. But she never stopped weeping until the child was born. She was still then, but she never put her foot beyond that door. She never asked anybody anything. If I began to tell her of some great raid and of all that was brought back, she put her hands over her ears. So I learned to tell her nothing. But you see, she is in the young Tiger. He's not his father." She sighed. "Why, in the old days," she began, leaning her elbows on the bed — and Molly, listening, saw the old days unrolled and heard things she had never dreamed. She saw great roaring dawns and huge breakfasts before battle, she saw hundreds of men running down the mountain side, past flaring torches held at the pass, swarming down into the valley, gathering in attack, bursting into city gates, laughing, drunk, laden with loot.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Did the young Tiger ever go with them?" she interrupted the old woman.

"Once," said the old woman, "only once — and his mother wept so bitterly that the old Tiger would not let him go again."

"Does he never go now?"

"Now!" said the old woman scornfully. "There have been no real raids these ten years. The old Tiger took to opium to ease a pain in his liver, and he lies asleep all the time. We live these days on taxes taken from the people, like magistrates instead of honest robbers, who only take from the rich and spare the poor."

She lay staring at the old woman. This, this, too, was her country. America was very far away. Had she ever been there? Was it not all a dream? Everything seemed a dream except this place where she now was. She fell asleep to the old woman's talking and dreamed she was a prisoner in this room, and still nothing bound her. She was free to walk out of the door, the door was open, but when she went toward it, she could not move. She woke in a sweat of fear. It was morning, and the bed was as warm and soft as her own. But the mountain sunshine that streamed in the window was brighter than any she had ever seen. The door opened, and the old woman came in with a brass basin of hot water and a pot of tea.

"The young master says if you will breakfast with him——" the old woman began.

She sprang out of bed. She was safe, and the evil was only a dream.

TIGER! TIGER!

They had talked about everything. They wanted to talk about everything at once and it was like leaping together across mountain tops. Some day they would go back over it all, exploring every valley. But now because each must know everything about the other they asked great wide questions, swallowing the answers quickly, gazing at each other.

"I've never seen a girl like you," he said.

They had finished breakfast and in a courtyard in the sun they had gone on talking.

"Tell me why you know English as though it were your own language, and tell me——"

And she asked him, "Why are you what you are? Who was your mother and why do you stay here? Do you know——?"

They told each other everything, and they ate their noon meal and talked and when the sun went down and the mountain air grew cold they ate their night meal and went into the library and sat talking and talking. To him she told how she hated the temple, and how she was weary with idleness and longed to do something, only what? And how she had not wanted Mary Lane to visit her because she was ashamed of a good many things — even of her mother, a little, and her father who did nothing but eat and sleep.

"I have often thought I would like to do something, too!" he said. "I grow very tired of this old fortress, and my father lies half asleep — he's old."

The night grew late and they parted, and the second day passed like the first. She had forgotten that she was in the fortress — or that he was the Tiger.

That second night she thought, startled, "I must go home." Two days ! Her mother would be telegraphing her father. She must go in the morning.

TODAY AND FOREVER

But it was hard to go. He took her hand and begged her not to go. He had been so imperious with her at first, he was imperious with everyone, but not with her now. His bold eyes were kind, and she saw only the goodness of his face and not the haughtiness.

"Don't go," he begged her. "There is so much we have not told each other — and I haven't shown you the mountain."

"I must, I must go," she said. "My father will upset the city to find me."

They looked at each other, aching, longing. They were at the gate now. His own horse stood there to take her, and a man to guide her to the foothills where a sedan was waiting. She stood filled with reluctance. The feeling of the dream returned to her. She was free to go, and somehow she could not.

"When — how — shall we meet ?" he whispered.

The guide was looking at them secretly, smiling under his dropped lids. She pulled her hand away.

"You could —" she suggested, "you could raid the city !"

She laughed as she spoke, but he was not laughing. He stood looking at her earnestly. When she was on her horse she turned. He was still looking at her.

All the way down the hills, all the way across the plains, she lived over again the astounding days. Only two mornings ago she had left the ship and her mother and Orchid. But in these hours the whole world was changed. She had never seen anyone like him. Her cousins, the young men in Shanghai — they were weaklings beside that strong straight figure she had left on the top of the mountains.

TIGER! TIGER!

All their clever talk, all their nimble clever brains — “There is no one like him,” she thought, the son of a common war-lord, but she could never forget him.

The sun was pouring over the rich landscape, over villages and shining canals and green and fertile fields. For the first time she felt the beauty about her as her own. These lands belonged to the Tiger. For years they had paid him tribute. She, too — her own father — paid him tribute. “We all belong to him,” she thought, half shyly. “He is like a king over us.”

Only when she was at the gate of her own home did she remember suddenly that she had forgotten the little pistol. It was still lying on the table in the room on the top of the mountain where she had slept last night. And then she laughed. She had even forgotten something else. She had forgotten to tell him why she had come.

In the courtyard of her own home the old gate-man rubbed his eyes with his knuckles.

“It’s not the young mistress!” he cried.

“Yes, it is,” she said composedly.

“But you are on the ship, in the midst of the sea!” he cried.

“I am here,” she replied. “Where is my father?”

“He is distracted,” the old man said. “He is in his library, gnawing his fingers. We gave him food, but he can’t eat. We don’t know what’s the matter.”

Ah, he had heard she was gone.

“I will go to him,” she said.

She crossed the inner court quickly and opened the library door softly. Her father was at the table, counting a heap of silver dollars. His fat face looked haggard, and the pale flesh hung in folds.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Father!" she said gently, not to startle him. But he was startled. He looked up, his face like tallow in the hard sunshine.

"Ma-li!" he cried. "You! Where is your mother?"

No, he had not heard she was gone. It was some other trouble.

"On the ship," she replied. She came in and shut the door and stood against it. "I didn't go," she said.

"Where have you been?" he asked.

At that moment she saw for the first time that what she had done was impossible, incredible. He would never believe her. For now for the first time it occurred to her that she had gone to a young man's house, a stranger's house. That alone was not to be explained. If she said she had been to the Tiger's Mountain, it would be insane. She shook her head.

"Where have you been?" he repeated.

"I can't tell you, Father," she said simply.

He stared at her heavily. "As if I hadn't trouble enough —" he said slowly, "as if I hadn't trouble enough — the Japanese — your mother — how can I betroth you to a respectable young man? Your mother told me before she went to arrange your marriage. 'Arrange her marriage,' she said. 'Girls had better be married in war-times.' Just like that, as though I were not having to collect all I possess for that robber! But who will have you at any price? How can I pay a man enough to make you his wife? Where have you been these two nights?" he roared at her. He pounded the table, and the heaps of silver dollars shook and fell, glittering in the sunshine. No, she could explain nothing to him.

TIGER! TIGER!

"You needn't choose a husband for me," she said.

"Don't be silly," he replied peevishly. "It is my duty. Besides, if I don't, how will you ever marry?"

"I will marry," she said breathlessly.

"One of these new love marriages!" he snorted.

"No, you will not marry in that fashion! I will choose your husband myself, decently, as my parents chose for me."

She went over to the table and looked down into his angry face.

"But I have chosen!" she whispered, and in that moment chose. Before he could speak, she had turned and run out of the room, out of the house, across the courtyards to the gate.

"Where is the sedan?" she cried to the old gateman.

"They went that way." He pointed with his chin up the street toward the mountain, away from the sea. "I never saw such surly fellows. Never one word of what village they came from or what their clan name was——"

But she was not listening. She was hurrying up the street. There was a tea shop near the edge of the town. They might be there, drinking tea, eating food before they went back.

They were there. She saw them, each with a bowl of noodles to his mouth. Everybody was staring at her, but she did not care. She went to them.

"I am ready to go back now," she said in a low voice.

They rose and followed her instantly, without surprise, as though they were waiting for her, and in a moment she was swinging on their shoulders over the country road, back to the mountain.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"I am joining the bandits," she thought in a daze. No, she wasn't. She was going back to him.

She was going back to him. It was nearly night when she reached the fortress gates. They were open, as though she were expected. Torches were flaring in sockets of bamboo poles thrust into the earth, and the courts were blazing with light. Upon the air there was the odour of spiced roasting meats. She was hungry — hungry and tired. She went through the gates, asking nothing of anyone. She went straight to the room where she knew he was. But he had heard her footsteps. He opened the door and came toward her.

"You are here," he said. "I told them not to leave the city without you."

"You told them——" she faltered.

"They were to wait until nightfall," he said. "If you did not come of your own will, you were to be found and brought back to me."

"Kidnapped!" she whispered. "You were going to kidnap me!"

"Look!" he said. He drew her to a window. Far down below them lay the darkening country. But in a certain spot there was a great cluster of tiny lights, moving toward the mountain.

"My army," he said. "If you had not come by night, the beacon fire would have been lit on the crest of the mountain, and they would have gone to your house and brought you back to me."

"I've kidnapped myself for you!" she cried, stupefied at what she had done.

He smiled down at her, not speaking.

TIGER! TIGER!

"I think I am glad I came by myself," she said slowly.

"In any case you would have come," he answered. "I had planned that before you went away."

He had planned everything, she found next day. She slept so deeply in her room that she felt she could never wake. But in the morning the old woman was shaking her awake.

"Your lord commands you," she was saying. "Your lord——"

Her lord! They were taking everything for granted. But she woke to the words and meekly she rose and bathed and dressed herself.

"You are to wait in the great hall," the old woman said. And in the great hall she waited, a little cold because the sun was not warm yet, and the hall was so big and flagged with stone. A servant brought food, and she ate it hungrily, and then he came, very formal and handsome in long robes of brocaded blue satin. She had not seen him dressed like that, and for a moment she was afraid. What was she doing, Molly Chu, graduate of Wellesley, American trained — a robber's son — a medieval man——

"Since we are to be formally betrothed to-day——" he began stiffly.

"I don't — I think I don't want to marry you," she cried wildly. "I think I — I want to go home."

He looked at her.

"You cannot," he said firmly. "It is I who choose." In his voice there was the sound of gates clanging, closing. If she ran away now there would be no waiting horse, no ready sedan. She was really kidnapped!

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Yesterday you came to me of your own will," he was saying. "But I know how women are. Today I am prepared to keep you, whether you will or not." He clapped his hands and the old manservant came in. "Tell my father," he commanded, "that we will present ourselves to him at once. At noon let the feast of betrothal be ready." He bowed to Molly. "Today we are betrothed, and tomorrow we will be married."

"No," she whispered, "no — it's too quick. I'm not sure——"

Her home rushed into her mind — her father, her mother — the rooms where she had played and slept — college, the American girls, Mary Lane — Mary would never believe all this — it couldn't happen except in China. "No — no!" she cried.

"You have your commands," he said to the manservant, and the manservant bowed and went away.

"Come with me," he ordered her in exactly the same tone of voice, and she obeyed him, not knowing what else to do. In a few moments she was standing beside him, in front of an old feeble man, sitting in a huge carved chair, wrapped in tiger skins. He had a great fleshless head. Every bone of the skull started from the skin. Over a beautiful sullen old mouth drooped wide long grey moustaches, and above the mouth sullen eyes burned through a grey film. It was the old Tiger.

"Bow to our father," the old Tiger's son was commanding her. And she bowed.

So she was married to him. They were over, the incredible two days of betrothal, of marriage. They were over in a daze of noise and wild feasting, of firecrackers and flaring torches and bonfires. The old woman, setting the head-veil of a bride on her head, had chuckled.

TIGER! TIGER!

"What the valley people will think!" she cried. "They will see the fire and hear the noise and shake in their beds. The men are beseeching the Tiger to let them raid some town for their pleasure. They have eaten and drunk so much that they are half mad."

The valley people! Her father was in the valley. She had come here to plead for her father, to tell the Tiger angrily what she thought of bandit warlords in this day and time, and instead . . .

"Now you are beautiful!" the old woman had said briskly. "Ah, we are happy!" she had gone on volubly. "We have been wanting him to marry for years. But he is so wilful — he would have his own choosing. A hundred women have wanted him — why, half the women we capture will not leave the mountain until he makes them go——"

She had wanted to tear the veil off her head.

"But when he sent the men after you," the old woman's voice was laughing, "we all rejoiced. We never knew him to care before whether a woman lived or died."

Yes, he had sent after her. If she had not come of her own will, he would have forced her to come back to him. She set the bead-veiled crown more firmly on her head.

"A man like the young Tiger needs a young wife," the old woman was saying as she knelt to adjust the folds of the embroidered skirt which once the Tiger's mother had worn at her own wedding. The brocade waistband was tight for her now, and they had had to move the buttons before she could wear it. "Now that you are come, perhaps he will want to fight again as he should and gain back what he has lost to the north of the mountain. The Blue Wolf seized it."

TODAY AND FOREVER

"I never heard of it," Molly said.

"You wouldn't," the old woman said carelessly. "Everybody says as a war-lord the Blue Wolf is nothing — nothing at all. It's his woman that is the real one — a wonderful woman, everybody says. It's she, really—— There, you are ready."

She had forgotten the old woman's chatter. She was ready. She went out and in the presence of the assembled army she drank the wine mingled with his, and beside him knelt to his family gods.

"Ma-li Chu," she had heard an American college president's voice saying not a year ago, as she stood to receive her degree, "it is with peculiar pleasure that I bestow upon you the degree of Bachelor of Arts, knowing that yours is an opportunity unparalleled in your country to forward the light of civilization and modern culture and science. Few women in our times are so fortunate."

Ten thousand miles away, upon a wild mountain top, in the presence of a robber band, she now knelt before these ancient gods of clay. It was all over, irrevocably over. She had drunk the wine mingled with his and eaten of the rice from his bowl.

"Who," she asked him teasingly, because she knew very well, "is the Blue Wolf?"

They had been married four days, four beautiful, long, sunny days. The fortress had stood in complete peace, wrapped about in a haze of sunshine clear above the misted valleys. The hordes of men were gone. She did not ask where because she did not want to know — not yet. She put everything away from her, except the moments of these days alone with him. Beneath the mists in the valley there were her father and mother of whom she must think. Her mother would turn and come home again, weeping, mourning. And her father would be dazed, not knowing whether he had really seen her or whether she was a ghost. They would be in such grief — she must tell them everything. But not yet. This man whom she had married was a wonder and a dream — a medieval baron, and a boy of her own age. She would change him, she thought. She would take that self-confident lordly power of his and shape it to the times. But first she must find out all that he was, listen to him, watch him, let him pour himself out in talk of his great plans. It was as though there were no government, no rulers in the land. He was planning a simple enlargement of the realm over which he ruled, whose people paid him tax.

TIGER! TIGER!

“I am going to make a big army,” he said, “an army of young men trained in all the things I have heard about. Airplanes — guns——” From among his books he had pulled out a book about the construction of bombing planes and another on modern cannon.

“I hate wars,” she had said violently.

He had opened his eyes. “What then?” he asked.

“You ought to do something for the people,” she said. “Make schools, for instance.”

But he had thought of schools.

“People’s schools,” he said.

He pressed her to know about American schools, Russian schools. She might have been talking to a young American man, a rich man’s son turned communist, his father’s conscience. Then someone had called him, and when in an hour he came back he was a savage.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"I shall fight that Blue Wolf," he cried. "He has robbed another village on the south of the mountain. I've tried peace—it's no good. I'll fight and cut off his head with my own sword."

They were in his own room, a big square room, full of his books, his enormous bed, his carved chair, the carved chest. He was rummaging in a big camphor-wood chest. From its depths he brought out a great old curved sword and drew it out of its scabbard. He was so changed, his face was so furious, that she felt she had never seen him before.

"Only a few minutes ago you were talking about schools for the people," she said.

"I shall teach them more than books in these schools," he said grimly. "They shall be taught to fight."

He was gone. He shut the heavy wooden door behind him so loudly that dust flew from its cracks. She sat, motionless, struck by his fierce looks, by his rough words. What was this man she had married so madly and so soon?

The fortress was a bedlam of noise and shouting. It swarmed with men, coarse, rough, wild, their eyes bold, their hair long and uncombed. Where had they come from? They poured up the mountain. When she looked out she could see them climbing the narrow rocky paths like goats, leaping nimbly up and up. There was the clanging of blacksmiths' hammers upon anvils, the smell of fresh leather, and the whinnying of horses.

"Stay in your rooms," the Tiger ordered her, and at first she obeyed him. From her windows she looked into the busy courtyards. The old Tiger came out of his sleep and stood, holding his long dragon-headed staff, his white beard flying in the wind. He kept shouting out advice in his weak old voice.

TIGER! TIGER!

"You must use retreat as a woman uses her fan!" he cried. "Woo your enemy with retreat until he has advanced to the point you have set for battle!"

A roar went up from the men. "Yes, yes, old Tiger!" they roared amiably.

Thus encouraged he shouted again, "The aggressors are not the victorious at last!" He waited and gathered his breath again. "Retreat and stand and bide your time — and strike!"

"Yes, yes, old Tiger!" they cried, admiring him.

But the young Tiger wasted no time in shouting. He was in his library, planning. Upon the desk was a huge map of the mountain and all the country about it. She stole in and found him poring over it, drawing black firm lines along roads and circles about towns. When he heard her he looked up.

"A month from today I shall be there." He pointed his finger at a spot. "It is the Blue Wolf's camp."

She looked into his eyes. He did not know she was there. He had not thought of her for hours. Something bitter and angry rushed into her heart.

"What of me?" she asked.

"What do you mean, what of you?" he answered.

"Where shall I be?"

"Where you are now," he replied, astonished, "at home, waiting for me."

"No," she said quickly, "no, I won't be. You are wrong. I won't be here when you come back."

TODAY AND FOREVER

She ran out of the room and away and into her own room, and throwing herself on her bed began to weep with her whole heart, not knowing why she did, except that he was leaving her.

And after a moment he came in. She felt his hand on her shoulder.

"Tell me what you meant when you said you would not be here when I came back," he demanded.

She did not answer. She lay still, feeling herself grow sullen and contrary as a child because she loved him and because he was willing to leave her. He turned her over strongly, and held her down by the shoulders and stared into her face.

"Do you hear me?" he asked.

She struggled free, sat up, and smoothed back her hair. "I meant simply what I said," she replied coldly. After all, she was not a child. "All this fighting," she went on, "it's absurd."

That was the beginning of the great quarrel.

The war waited while they quarrelled. She would not leave her room. He came in and they quarrelled and he flung himself away from her again. Outside the men muttered and shouted and horses stamped and shook their heads. The old Tiger forgot all his advice and went back to his opium while they waited. She was alone in her room for hours while he sat in his library, his head sunk in his hands over the map he no longer studied. She did not read, she did not write the letter she had planned to her parents. Why should she write when at any moment she would be leaving to return to them? He had not yielded, except that he had not yet gone. But at any moment he might go. He had ordered that the horses be kept saddled and waiting and no man was to go down the mountain. So it had been for nearly three days, for so long they had quarrelled.

TIGER! TIGER!

It had all begun out of that moment of her jealousy, and it had grown and grown into a monstrous thing from which neither could retreat. For she had said if he went out to this silly war she would go home and never come back. And he had said he would order the gates locked so that she would be a prisoner.

And she said, "I'll hate you forever, then. My body may be here, but you will have lost me forever."

"Why?" he demanded.

"Because you would be too stupid, too crude, for any woman to love, except a woman as ignorant as yourself," she replied recklessly.

"I am not ignorant!" he had roared at her.

"You are, you are!" she cried. "Why, what other country has men like you? Why, I would be ashamed before my American friends."

"You can go to America and I would not care," he muttered and flung himself out of the room.

And then he was back again and he shouted, "I don't know why I don't kill you and go on about my business!"

"Kill me!" she demanded. "It's all you know how to do!"

"No woman's worth all this!" he said, beside himself, and flung himself out again. But he did not kill her. And she waited, loving him and so angry she could have bitten her own hands.

Once he came in, deceptive and gentle, and sat down, his sword hanging at his side, and though she hated him, she told herself, she could not help seeing how handsome he was and loving him.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Ma-li," he began, "what is this feeling you have against my way of life? I am a chieftain, and the son of a chieftain."

"You are a rebel against the government," she retorted. "There is a price on your head."

"Government!" he said scornfully. "Governments come and go. In the last twenty years there have been three. But I——"

"Do you know how the people hate you?" she cried passionately. "Do you know how the Tiger Tax oppresses them?"

"It's a lie," he said slowly. "I take from the rich, but never from the poor. It is against the tradition of all righteous robbers."

"My father——" she began.

"He is a rich man," he broke in, "and you are his daughter!"

She looked at him and began to laugh wildly.

"As if there could be such a silly thing as a righteous robber!" she cried. "Certainly there is no such person anywhere else in the world. A robber! I've married a common robber! I don't know any righteous robbers!"

He was gone again. The wall shook to the bang of the door. She leaned her arms on the table and bent her head down on them.

Then after a long time the door opened gently, and she listened without looking up. He had come back. If he had come back, she would beg him—but it was not he. It was the old woman. She tip-toed in.

"The men are growing angry over the delay," she whispered. "They are plotting something."

She lifted her head to look at the old woman.

TIGER! TIGER!

"I heard talk. 'Get the woman—it is the woman,' they said. That's you, lady!"

And suddenly, staring into the rough, wrinkled old face and shrewd eyes, Molly was terrified. She leaped to her feet.

"I want to go home," she panted. "I wish I weren't here. I wish I had never come—they're beasts and savages. I don't know what I ever thought I could do."

She ran out of the room, across the hall, into the library. She would tell him to go on to his wars. She gave up. She wanted to go home because she wished she had never seen him. They were two who should never have been mated, a woman like her and a man like him. It was finished. She cared no more.

But when she reached the doorway he was standing by his desk. He had taken off his sword, and he looked at her out of dark and troubled eyes, holding his sword in his hands.

"You are right," he said before she could speak, and his voice was so humble it was not his. "I know I am ignorant and a coarse crude man. If I lost you, I'd have no light ahead. You came to me like light that day. I will do anything you say. I love you."

They looked at each other and she forgot the old woman and the plotting men. She ran to him, holding out her arms.

"Why did we quarrel?" she whispered, and strained herself against him.

And she heard his sword clatter upon the stone floor

It was hard to believe that they could ever have quarrelled. They loved each other desperately. In the morning he went out and brusquely he told his men to go home to their farms and villages. There would be no war against the Blue Wolf.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Never?" they asked, dismayed.

"No," he said abruptly.

He ordered money to be given them, and they went away in dazed silence, looking at each other. It was as though a king had stepped from his throne for a woman, only there was no heir, and they were left without a ruler. They went home, not knowing what to do, since so long as they could remember they had obeyed the Tiger, old and young.

"We have nothing left but the government now," they said mournfully as they went slowly away.

"What's the government?" another answered.

And in the quiet fortress alone with her the Tiger looked at Molly.

"What shall I do now?" he asked her, like a child.

She was overwhelmed with him and for a moment she was afraid. The fortress was strange about her.

"Let's go home," she said breathlessly. "I want to go to my home."

"I will do whatever you tell me to do," he said.

Before the day was at noon they were down the mountain and crossing the plains. And she, behind the curtains of her sedan, was planning what she would do. Her mother would be there by now, and she would walk quietly in with him. "Father, Mother," she would say, "this is my husband." Then she would wait a moment and then she would say, "He is the son of the Tiger."

After that — it was impossible to tell what would happen after that.

"Father," she was saying, "Mother, this is my husband."

TIGER! TIGER!

In the library the two old people sat staring at her. Her mother was dressed in mourning. She wore white shoes and a white cord was bound into her hair. But her father was as usual.

"I thought you were dead," her mother whispered. "Young people kill themselves so easily nowadays. I thought you were angry with us for something."

"I told you it wasn't her ghost I saw," her father said.

Their old minds could not grasp it quickly enough. She was here — this tall young man——

"Your husband!" her mother repeated. "I don't know him."

"I've never seen him," her father muttered, looking away from them.

"I told you I had chosen," she reminded him.

"It's never been done like this," he answered, and still he would not look at her.

Then she said exactly as she had planned, "He is the son of the Tiger."

She was not sure they heard her at all. But her father looked up suddenly, his mouth open.

"There's something the matter with you," he said. "You — you're beside yourself——"

"She shouldn't have gone to America," her mother cried.

Molly turned to the Tiger. "Speak to them," she told him.

"What shall I say?" he asked.

"Anything," she said, "so they can hear your voice, and know you are real."

So he said, very pleasantly and simply, "She — your daughter — came to my house to——" He looked at Molly, taken aback. "You never told me why you came," he interrupted himself.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"It was like this, Father," she said quickly. "I saw you so worried that day with the city elders, and I made up my mind I'd go alone and see what the Tiger was and tell him how wicked he was to go on oppressing the people the way he had for years and years. I thought, 'He is only an ignorant old man. If someone told him he might change — if someone told him that he was a disgrace to our people' — and I really went to save you, Father."

Her father gasped, and then he coughed behind his hand. "I see," he said, "and so you brought the Tiger home with you."

"Oh, how I prayed the gods, too!" her mother wailed suddenly. "I prayed that you would be wed before the month was out — but they played a trick on me."

"I told you it wasn't safe to tell the gods things you want," her father said grimly. "They have such a sense of mischief — they grant prayers so wryly."

They sat in stricken silence. Suddenly the Tiger cleared his throat.

"I am not so bad," he said. "You might try me."

"If the gods sent him, Mother," said Molly, laughing, "you ought to accept him."

They clasped hands and looked steadily into the two old dubious bewildered faces.

But they could think of him only as the Tiger.

"He is very large," her mother said faintly one morning. "The house seems small for him."

Do what she would Molly could not get her parents to forget he was the Tiger. She gave him a name of her own — Brave Peace she called him — "Because of his own will he gave up being a warlord," she explained.

TIGER! TIGER!

"What are you going to do with him?" her father asked one night. "He's not used to cities. He paces up and down like a beast in a cage. It can't go on."

And indeed she was beginning to see herself that something must be done. The soft peace of the old house was stifling to the Tiger.

"I can't breathe in this air," he complained. "The warm sea winds choke me — I'm used to the mountains."

He was full of remorse, too, that he had left the old Tiger.

"I shouldn't have left my father like that, so suddenly," he said to her again and again. "It's against what Confucius told us."

"He was asleep," she argued. "You know you said yourself he would sleep all day. And for days you didn't go near him."

"It's against Confucius," he repeated.

"Oh, people don't take Confucius for a god these days," she said half petulantly.

"Confucius was good," he argued.

"Go back if you want to," she cried at him.

"No, no," she said quickly, "I don't mean it."

He did not go back. Sometimes she was sure he would never go back, sometimes after the long hours they were alone together. For there were those hours when they fell again into long intimate talk, and she saw his mind, untrained but powerful, and full of energy. She put aside all jealousy and angers then and wished with humility that she knew how to direct this energy. He was a man who could be made into anything if she knew how to do it.

"Would you like to study?" she asked him one day.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"What?" he asked.

"Many things," she replied, "books, science——"

"Yes," he said eagerly.

She fetched her old college books, and for hours they were happy together. Then suddenly he would stretch himself, leap to his feet, and go out into the courtyard and begin his quick pacing. It was that sturdy restless tread that made her father shake his head and say, "It's a beast caged."

"I never thought I'd be afraid of my son-in-law," her mother said faintly, "but I'll always be afraid of him."

"I'm afraid of him, too," Orchid whispered. "Everybody is afraid of him."

And suddenly Molly was afraid of him, not any more as the Tiger, but now as a man, a restless able domineering man, born and trained as a king is to command and to do, and now there was nothing to do. He was there, constantly with her, demanding everything of her. He was stretching her very brain with his demands upon her. She was studying as she had never studied in college that she might answer his ruthless questions into every book they read. And she saw that this learning would never be enough for him. She began to wake in the night afraid. Suppose she, too, one day were not enough for him?

She grew thin with her worry over him. He was too much for her—too strong, too wilful, too restless.

"We must go out," she thought. She planned in the darkness. "If we go to Shanghai, it will amuse him."

When morning came she asked him, "Would you like to go to Shanghai?"

TIGER! TIGER!

"Why should I go to Shanghai?" he said.

"To — to see all the new things," she told him. "You've never seen moving pictures and automobiles — you might like to dance, even. I do."

"Ha!" he said shortly. "Stuff for children."

She coaxed him. "Shall we have some feasts to celebrate our coming home?"

He grinned a little at this. "Do you think your friends would relish feasting with the Tiger?" he asked.

She did not answer. No, they wouldn't. Her father had been worrying over it. "I ought to give a wedding feast," he said, "in decency, that is. But my friends would be afraid to come. I know how they feel. I wouldn't come near the Tiger if I didn't know what he really is — just a young man — very restless, though, Ma-li, very restless!"

"What shall I do with him?" she asked herself desperately.

And then, one day, suddenly, he was gone. He had leaped to his feet in one of his restless fits and, striding into the courtyard, he had begun to walk up and down in the way she was learning to dread. She had looked after him, not knowing whether to go to him or not. Across the court she saw her father's grave face in a window. He was watching the young man, too, his eyes full of pity. It was that pity which she could not endure. She turned and ran into her room and shut the door. What could she do with this man she had married? There was no place for him in this house. If they went to Shanghai — but what would he do in Shanghai? She thought of her cousins, debonair dapper young men, working in offices by day, dancing at some club at night — they would shrink from this big, abrupt, uncultivated man. If she tried to teach him to dance, he would say, "What is this nonsense? I am no child." She could not imagine him following her into a theatre meekly, or sitting beside her in an automobile. No, he would never do in Shanghai.

TODAY AND FOREVER

She crept to her bed and behind its curtains she began to weep, because whatever he was she loved him, and because she knew she could not make him happy. She rose at last, and, sighing, she wiped her face and smoothed back her hair. She would try again. She went to find him, and he was gone. The courtyard where he had been was empty. A cat sat crouched beneath a bird-cage someone had hung on a bamboo tree, that was all. It was after noon of the summer's day, and the air was still. She listened and could hear no sound, except the soft murmur of the city from beyond the wall.

At first she thought, "He has gone into one of the other courts." She walked quietly from one court to another. But he was in none of them. Then she walked through the house. He was not there. In the library her father was asleep, his fan over his face. Her mother was in her rooms. Even Orchid was not to be seen. It was the hour when even the servants were sleeping. She went to the gate, and the old gateman sat sleeping on his wooden bench, his head thrown back against the wall and his mouth open.

She called to him sharply. "Has anyone — has my lord gone through the gate?"

He mumbled himself awake. "No — no —" he muttered, smacking his dry mouth, "no — no — no —"

TIGER! TIGER!

"You wouldn't have known it if an army had come in," she cried. And then she looked at the gate. The bar was drawn back. She looked in the dust of the threshold. It was full of footprints — the footprints of big wide-soled shoes, the shoes that the bandits wore, the padded soles that clung to rocks and rough paths. Had they come for him, and had he gone back to them? And instantly this house was empty for her.

"I shall follow him," she cried to her heart. She ran back to the room and changed her garments and put on her strong American shoes and took her purse. She would go straight to the mountain after him.

And slipping through the quiet house, she drew the front gate softly open. The old gateman was asleep again. Outside on the street she bargained swiftly with the bearers.

"It is midsummer, and the sun is hot. There must be extra tea-money," they said.

"Yes," she promised, "double tea-money — anything."

And when she was safely hidden behind the curtains she began to plan wildly. "They would live on the mountain — she would let him be what he liked — anything, anything if he could be happy.

At the foothills, where she paused for an hour, she asked the sullen farmer, "When did my lord pass?"

He shook his head. "No one has passed here today." He might never have seen her before. There was no recognition in his eyes.

"He did — he did!" she cried.

He thrust his chin at the tethered horses. "There his horse is," he said calmly. It was true. His horse was there, a black Mongolian that he always rode. He had not passed. She wavered. Far above her was the fortress. As the light lay now from the sun she could barely see its grey walls. Beneath her was the blue sea and the town and her home.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Saddle me a horse," she commanded him.

"He is not——" the man began, without moving.

"Obey me," she said. "I am his wife, and you know it."

It was night when she reached the fortress gates. They were locked, but she beat upon them. She had come alone, knowing her way, not wanting the sullen-faced man to be with her. The gate opened. It was the old manservant. He peered out at her.

"Is your master here?" she demanded.

"Only the old one," he said, "— sleeping."

He was not there. What had happened to him? Where could she find him now? Her head drooped with weariness.

"I will come in and sleep," she said.

He opened the gate and let her in, and she slipped from her horse and walked through the courts. There was no one to be seen, until she came to the inmost court. There was the old woman, eating a bowl of rice gruel. She looked up, swallowed, and rose.

"You, lady!" she mumbled and looked away.

"Yes," said Molly. Across her mind sprang a flash. These people — the old man, this hag — they knew where he was, and she would pry it from them. If she did not find him her life would be nothing but this passing from one emptiness to another. Around her the fortress stood, empty of everything except the night wind. She went into her old room and opened the drawer of the table. There it was — her little pistol she had forgotten. The old woman followed her in, champing her jaws a little, chewing the fragments of salted vegetable in her rice.

TIGER! TIGER!

"Do you want——?" she began.

But Molly went quickly to the door and stood against it.

"Now!" she said steadily, "tell me where he is."

She pointed the pistol into the old woman's face and waited.

"I was going to tell you," the old woman mumbled. Sweat broke out on her forehead.

"Tell me now," Molly said.

"He has been taken," she whispered, "by mistake."

"What mistake?"

"It was you they wanted."

"Who?"

"The men."

"Why?"

"Because they said you held them back from their rights of war. So they sold you."

"Sold me?"

"To the Blue Wolf. You were to be taken — from your home."

"When?"

"Today — at the time for sleeping. Two men were to come in saying they——"

"Who were they?"

"They were to lead the Blue Wolf's men."

"Then what?"

"There were others waiting to rush in, if needful."

"I heard no one."

The old woman's whisper sank. "No, they enticed the Tiger to the gate of your house, so that they might enter more easily. They said his father——”

TODAY AND FOREVER

“But he is gone.”

“The Blue Wolf’s men took him.”

“And his own men?”

“They were so afraid when they saw the Tiger taken instead of you that they ran.”

“Did they say nothing?”

“They said, ‘It was the woman we sold to you — not he.’”

“And then?”

“The Blue Wolf’s men said, ‘But we have been told to bring the man.’ So they ran.”

“It is not like my husband to let himself be bound,” Molly said slowly. It was hard to believe.

“Ah, lady, there were five men to hold him — strong men.”

“And no one saw?”

“It was the sleeping hour. They had a cart waiting, and three men were behind the curtains to bind him.”

“Who plotted this?”

“His own men — two of them——”

“Send for them — no — wait — I am going home.”

“Lady! Not by night!”

“Yes — now — I have his horse. It is sure-footed.”

She put the pistol in her bosom and without waiting for food she mounted the horse again. She must believe the old woman.

It was nearly dawn when she reached home. She had ridden all the way. The gateman let her in, his eyes staring. She did not speak. She went straight to her father's room. He cried out when he saw her, "Ma-li! What?"

TIGER! TIGER!

"Father," she interrupted him, "Father, give me the Tiger Tax. I need it. I must have it."

She felt her head begin to swim. It had been so long since she had eaten or slept. She swayed and fell.

How long she slept she did not know. But when she woke, everything she had planned leaped into her mind. She sat up. She needed a great deal of money, enough for an army. She would gather an army and go against the Blue Wolf—the Tiger's own army. She would collect them all somehow, buy them guns. Once there had been a Chinese girl in history who had taken her father's armies because he was old and had led them to successful battle. The door opened suddenly, and her father came in, a telegram in his hand. His face was grey.

"We are lost," he said haggardly.

"What is it?" she cried. "Oh, something has happened to him."

"I don't know what you mean," he said. "The country's lost—the Japanese have come to Shanghai. Your uncle says——"

Her mind ran ahead of the words. The Japanese—then the last bogey of her childhood was real—everything was absurd—anything could happen—the Japanese——

"They will sweep the coast with their bombs," her father cried. "We'll all be killed. Oh!" he wailed, "we aren't ready—no one is ready—no armies trained—no generals——"

"If he were here," she said, "he would do something—Why, he has an army—it's all ready——"

TODAY AND FOREVER

They were staring at each other.

"Where is he?" her father asked.

"I know where he is," she said breathlessly. "The Blue Wolf — they kidnapped him — I wanted the money — to——"

"You shall have it," he declared. "It was to have been given them days ago, but no one came for it."

"An airplane," she said recklessly, "a little airplane that can land in a small space on a mountain — in a courtyard, even — and a pilot."

"I will telegraph your uncle in Shanghai for one to come here," he said.

"It must be big enough to bring him back," she said.

He nodded and went out. She sat a moment, her mind whirling madly. "It's a mad country," she thought, "it's all mixed together — the Blue Wolf and the Japanese — he and I——"

She had flown once in America, just to know what it was like. She and Mary Lane had flown to Washington on a holiday to see the Japanese cherry blossoms. And standing under the delicate flowers, shattering in the breeze, falling in fragrant drifts, she had forgotten that her father had taught her always to hate Japan. People who could give cherry blossoms could not be enemies. But bombs were dropping over Shanghai, like flower petals out of the sky.

This being braced into the cockpit of a little plane was not in the least like the great luxurious passenger plane. Even the earth did not look the same. Here it looked too close, too clear. The pilot was a young Chinese from Shantung. They had had to speak in English because their dialects were different.

TIGER! TIGER!

"Tell him to be careful," her father had said, his old face a knot of anxiety.

"My father has never seen an airplane," she said to the pilot instead. "He is anxious."

"He need not be," the young man said. "I spend half my time in the air."

"Training?" she asked.

"For Japanese," he explained. "We get as many as we can."

The engine began to roar and they were mounting. The city dropped away from them and the sea lay like a huge blue bubble. She wanted to say proudly, "My husband will bring his army against them," but when she opened her mouth the words were torn out of it by the wind. They were going straight up, and she clutched the sides of her seat. Three days it took to reach the Blue Wolf's mountain, everybody said, three days by horse and foot.

"A little over three hours," the young man had said when they started. "I want to get back to Shanghai tonight. The money you give me will buy a load of bombs."

"I will double it," her father had said.

They began to drive into the eastern sky. The dawn was turning to day and they were rushing to meet the sun. The clouds flew by. Below them the land became a green blur, the shining spots were ponds, and a streak of light was a canal. This was today; she was going to her love on the wings of today. In the villages below them men and women were beginning their age-old life, the women to cook on age-old earthen stoves, the men to harness water-buffaloes to age-old wooden ploughs. And in a little while she would drop into an ancient fortress. What she would find there she did not know, except that he would be there. He must be there. They could not kill him. She had not thought of it, that they might kill him. And yet they were his enemies — she had forgotten that. If he were dead, she would gather up his armies and sweep them from the earth. She would buy a bombing plane and drop bombs down upon them like falling petals.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Faster!" she cried, but again the wind tore the word from her.

The pilot was circling slowly, close above the mountains now, searching them. They were barren mountains, covered only with a scanty green. He nodded and she looked down. There, between the two crests of a mountain, was a shallow valley, and in the valley were low houses built of mountain rock. A wall encircled them. It must be the Blue Wolf's camp. There was nothing else anywhere near. Besides, he had gone to the magistrate's office and asked exactly the location of the mountain. They had given him a map. Everybody knew where the robbers lived, because merchants had to be warned if they went over the mountain pass. He began to slide rapidly down. The wind stopped roaring and now she could shout to him.

"You are to wait with your engine ready. The instant we come, be ready! We may come running for our lives."

He nodded. Below them tiny figures were gathering out of the stone huts. She could see their faces upturned, their arms upraised. The plane dropped suddenly and they scattered.

"They are afraid," she said to him. "They've never seen a plane. Keep your engine ready, I say!"

TIGER! TIGER!

He nodded, and she felt the plane strike the earth once, twice, and then stand quivering. Men were looking out of doors and coming toward them, half fearfully. She leaped to the ground lightly, and facing them, she made her voice bold.

"Where is your lord?" she demanded. "I have come to see him." She had determined that she would say nothing of the Tiger, lest she be taken prisoner. No, let them wonder who she was.

No one answered. They looked at each other. If she had never seen their like before she might have been afraid of them. But she knew them—they were the same rude, wild malcontents that followed any war-lord.

"You had better speak," she said quietly. "I come with important news for him." She turned to the plane. "You can see I have come in haste, by a ship through the air."

"Is that what it is?" a man asked curiously. "When I saw it I thought it was an eagle."

"We have heard of them but we haven't seen them," another said. They were like big children, wanting to touch the strange thing and afraid to do it. They had forgotten what she had asked.

"Take me to your master, and while I am gone you may look at it," she said.

They looked at each other and one of them laughed sheepishly.

"The truth is, lady," he said, "we haven't a master. The Blue Wolf is a woman."

"A woman?" She stared, unbelieving, from one face to the other.

"The Blue Wolf died last spring," the man said.

"But no one knew."

TODAY AND FOREVER

"His woman told us not to tell," another man said. "She told us that she could lead us as well as any man."

They nodded. "Yes, she has done it, too."

"Take me to her!" Molly demanded.

A woman! She longed to ask where he was, what they had done with him. Perhaps he was already dead. At least he was bound and in one of these huts, a prisoner. It was going to be harder to free him if a woman . . .

"Well, I will lead you," one of the men said at last. And she followed him. Her hand was in her pocket and her pistol lay in her palm.

What sort of woman could this one be, she wondered, so bold as to take a war-lord's place? There had been a few such — stories were told of them among the people. Orchid used to tell her the stories. But they were fairy-tales, and this woman was a real woman.

"Here," said the man, "that's her door. Go in if you like. I will not tell her. She has such a temper that she would kill me if she knew it was I who led you here."

He was gone, and she was left standing before a closed door. She stood a moment and then softly she laid her ear against the wood. Listening, she could hear a murmur of voices, no, two voices. One was the woman's. She could hear it, clear and rather loud. The other voice — it was a man's, and she knew it. It was his. She pushed the door suddenly with both hands, and it flew open. There was the Tiger. A woman was sitting in a great carved chair, and he was standing beside her, looking down at her. When the door opened the woman's voice broke clearly into her ears.

TIGER! TIGER!

"Together," the woman was saying, "together we could do anything."

Then the woman saw her and, seeing the look on her face, the Tiger turned and his hand dropped.

"You!" he said.

"Yes," she said quietly. He came a step toward her, but she did not move. "I thought I should find you bound," she said. She gazed straight into his eyes, accusing him.

"I was brought here bound," he answered.

"You are free now," she said. She heard her own voice.

"This woman had me freed," he said. "My ankles are still sore from those thongs." He laughed. "It was partly my own fault. I fought against them."

"Who is she?" Molly moved her chin toward the woman a very little.

He laughed again. "Here is a strange thing — there is no Blue Wolf. It's she who has led his armies all these months. I've been fighting a woman!"

But Molly did not laugh. "What was she saying when I came in?" she demanded of him.

He turned to the woman. "What was it you were saying?"

Now she could look at the woman. She was a dark wild-looking peasant woman, young and big as a man, dressed in an old-fashioned embroidered coat of plum colour. Her skin was brown and red, and her mouth was full-lipped and yet hard. She looked at the Tiger as if Molly were not there and she said in the same voice in which she had been speaking when Molly came in, "If you and I join one to the other, our armies, our lands, our very selves, who could conquer us? We could overthrow the government as others have done before us, and we could bring back the empire. You would be emperor and our sons would be princes."

TODAY AND FOREVER

"I never heard such stuff!" Molly cried. She ran to the Tiger and took his arm in both her hands and clung to him. "You wouldn't believe her!"

But he did not move. He was looking into the woman's handsome dark face. Molly dropped his arm suddenly, and took a step toward the woman.

"Are you declaring war against me?" she demanded of her.

"Go back to Shanghai," the woman said. "That is where women like you belong. What do you know of war?"

The Tiger did not speak. He stood looking at the woman, and Molly could not endure the hesitation in his look. He did not move toward her, he did not smile. There was only that steady pondering in his eyes. He was deciding what it was he wanted to do.

"Have you forgotten me?" she cried.

"I was born to fight," he said, "not to sit around in cities."

His voice was sullen, and then he turned away from them both and went and stood by a window.

"Do you choose her instead of me?" she asked him, and was angry that her voice sounded so faint.

"I don't choose a woman," he said. "I choose a life."

"But she's asking you to go back into the past!" Molly cried.

"My men have guns, too," the woman said proudly, "and swords and spears."

Molly laughed with fury. "What use are they?"

TIGER! TIGER!

Why, war now comes out of the sky ! In a few hours a city is destroyed — by a few men ! ”

“ It’s your evil magic,” the woman cried. “ But I can kill you before you——”

“ It’s not mine, stupid,” Molly said scornfully. “ It’s the magic of the new world. No one can stop it. It wouldn’t matter whom you killed here on top of this mountain.” She turned to the Tiger. “ She doesn’t know anything, locked up in these mountains ! ”

“ Why should I believe you ? ” the woman asked.

But Molly gave her no heed. She had gone to her husband and taken his hand in both her own and she stood holding it against her breast. It was like holding a stone to her heart, but she pressed it there.

“ Come with me,” she said.

He did not answer, and the woman leaned forward in her chair.

“ Your army and mine——” she said to him.

Molly dropped his hand. The real war was between her and this woman.

“ Do you choose her ? ” she demanded. “ A peasant, who can’t write her name ? Is this the one you want to be the mother of your son ? ”

She had begun quietly and bravely, but suddenly her blood broke its restraint and pounded through her body. She flew at the Tiger and seized him by the shoulders to shake him. He was twice as heavy as she, but she shook him. “ I hate you ! ” she cried at him. “ You know no woman but me shall bear your sons ! ”

He was looking into her eyes. A slow smile was creeping up from the depths of him.

“ Will you come back to the fortress if I let you bear my sons ? ” he inquired.

TODAY AND FOREVER

She shook her head. "I won't promise," she said. The woman was looking at them painfully, eagerly. "I won't promise anything," she repeated stubbornly, "nothing — except a son!"

A smile was breaking to the surface of his dark eyes. She saw it coming like light into his face and she loved him and hated him together.

"I won't let you go — not you or him——" the woman said suddenly.

"You can't stop us," Molly replied. "I came by magic."

"What magic?" the woman demanded.

"By wings," Molly replied mischievously. She would use the woman's ignorance.

"I believe nothing you say," the woman shouted.

"This morning I was at the sea-coast," Molly cried, "and it is not yet noon. By mid-afternoon I shall be at the sea again. Look out of the door!" She went quickly to the door and threw it open to the court. There was the plane in the midst of crowding curious men. When he saw her, the young pilot started his engine suddenly with a roar and the woman leaped in her seat, her eyes terrified.

"Come on!" Molly cried to the Tiger. He hesitated. Then she shouted with all her strength, "Come, I say! The Japanese are attacking Shanghai!"

He stared at her for one second. Then he leaped for the door. He pushed the men right and left, dividing them like a strong wind, and she was in his wake. He clawed at the plane.

"How do I get into it?" he was shouting.

But now the woman was shrieking after them. "Hold them — catch them!" The men saw what was about to happen and they rushed to hold him.

TIGER! TIGER!

He struggled with them, but a dozen hands were holding his legs as he scrambled into the seat. She felt them catch at her, too, and in that instant she put her hand into her bosom for her pistol. "Here!" she cried. He seized it from her and lifted it over their heads and the shots crackled in the still mountain air. They shrank back for a second, and in that second he leaned over and took her under the arms and lifted her into the seat with him. The plane was moving, was running across the wide court; it lifted itself above the amazed upturned faces and grasping outstretched hands. It cleared the wall and began climbing the sky. He cupped his hands.

"We must strengthen the fortress!" he shouted in her ear.

"They're only at Shanghai!" she screamed back at him.

"They'll get Shanghai!" he roared. "City people! Easy! The real war will be inland — at the mountains! We'll be there! Ready! Never give up! I've been waiting for this all my life!"

They were sweeping over the mountains now, which stood like a great wall to the inner country. She looked down over them, over the valleys, toward the sea. His voice was roaring in her ear again.

"I'll hire some fellows like this — buy bombing planes——"

He had never been in a plane in his life, but he sat at ease, as though he had done it every day. He was planning. She could see his puckered forehead. "I'll even offer myself to the government!" he shouted, his voice like a trumpet. "We must unite now——"

She laughed and moved her fingers in the air on an imaginary typewriter.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"What?" he bellowed.

"Now is the time for all good men——" she screamed, but he shook his head. He could not hear her. Her voice was too light.

She did not try to answer. She had him. They were miles in the air. The mountains lay like a knotted chain across the earth.

Drumming against her ear she heard his roar. "Why didn't you tell me at once that the Japanese were here? It would have saved time!"

She picked up his hand and with her finger she wrote in Chinese letters in his palm. "I wanted you to choose me — without the help — of the Japanese."

He threw up his head and laughed. She could hear the echoes of his great laugh through the wind. He cried :

"I chose you at my own door the first moment I saw you!"

She folded his hand and held it against her breast again. It was warm now, and full of power. It pressed against her. The young pilot turned his head to say something to them, then he looked away again quickly. But the Tiger did not care.

"A war!" he was roaring. "It is all I need!"

He was incredible. Nobody would believe in him. If she tried to tell Mary Lane about him, she couldn't explain him. The whole story of him was mad and impossible. It couldn't have happened in America, or anywhere else except here. They were driving across the sky. Ahead in time and space were their enemies. But beneath them were the mountains, filled with fierce wild men, the Tiger's men, guarding the old inner gates. She was not afraid.

Golden Flower

How it had happened that the Japanese had captured her she could not understand. She sat in a corner of the prison, a little away from her men, her back turned toward them, her knees drawn up to her body, and locked by her arms. None of them had said a word to her since hours ago they had been thrust into this windowless room and the iron bars drawn. She knew what the room was — the great granary and storehouse of the temple. The monks used to keep their supplies here. Once in a bad year she and Big Stupid Chen, the bandit chieftain to whom she then belonged, had talked about robbing it to feed the men. But Big Stupid had been afraid of the gods in the temple. She remembered this now because she had said to him angrily :

“ I am not afraid of gods more than of men, and men I do not fear at all ! ”

It had occurred to her at this moment for the first time that if ever anything happened to Big Stupid, she would take over the band. Why not? Was there anything he did which she did not think of and plan and put into his head to do? When he had died — not of an honourable wound, but of eating too many crabs on a hot summer's day five years ago — she had been ready. She had called the men together and said :

TODAY AND FOREVER

“ I am a woman, but other women in our history have led men to battle. Mu-lan, when her father's strength failed, took his horse and his sword and led his army to victory.” She pointed to a dividing line of light and darkness where the shadow of an old tree fell across a grassy hillside. “ Let those who follow the banner of Golden Flower step out of the shadow and stand in the sunshine.”

Of all of Big Stupid's men at that moment not one failed to move into the sunlight. She had watched them gravely. Had any not stepped to the light, she would have cried out a sharp command to those already prepared and in a moment they would have been dead. But this was not needed. They all knew who had been their true leader even before Big Stupid died. . . .

She hugged her knees more closely. Behind her in the dimness lit only by the cracks of light around the barred gate, she knew they were looking at her — these men who had chosen to follow her. She thought :

“ They are saying to themselves that it is because I am a woman that we have been captured by the Japanese. I urged them too far. A man would have been satisfied to have retaken the city. But no, I must rush on and try to capture the whole Japanese army in retreat ! ”

She grovelled in self-blame. Then her pride rose. She leaped to her feet and turned toward them. She flung her head backward to toss her short hair out of her eyes.

“ Do not forget how often I have led you to victory ! ” she cried. “ Remember that for five years you have had food to eat and shelter when it rained and warm clothing when you were cold ! ”

GOLDEN FLOWER

The men grunted. One of them spat on the ground. “ Have we ever complained ? ” he inquired.

But Golden Flower pressed further.

“ When the Japanese came, I offered myself and my men to Chiang Kai-shek before any others. He accepted us. In this province none have had as many victories as we have. No day has passed that in one way or another we have not killed Japanese. One lonely sentry is not too small to be called a victory. A hundred men in a scouting party does not satisfy us. We kill them all. And yesterday we took back the city we lost last month and killed as traitor the puppet magistrate the Japanese set up and his wife with him ! ”

She paused again and looked about.

“ Do we complain ? ” the same voice asked.

She whirled nearer them in one of the swift acrobatic movements her father had taught her when she was a child, in those days when with her father and mother she had travelled from village to village in their little family circus. She never remembered a home or a settled house. That was why now she could move from place to place with such swiftness that the Japanese never knew where she would next attack them. Certainly they had not expected her yesterday at the city gates. No capture had ever been easier. She and her men had slipped inside the walls, disguised as farmers and labourers, until she had a thousand men there. When the last man was in, he came and told her, and exactly as she had planned, he had already cut the single telephone wire that connected the small Japanese garrison holding the city with General

TODAY AND FOREVER

Seki's headquarters in the larger city, which was the capital of the province. They locked the city gates. Then quietly, in the absolute silence in which she had taught her men to work, they gathered about the Japanese garrison and mingled with the crowd. Big Stupid always wanted his men to shout and terrify the enemy by noise. Hearing their shouts his own courage grew greater. But she worked best in silence.

"Let them fear us by what we do," she had always taught her men.

So they had fallen upon the Japanese garrison and killed half of them before the rest escaped by a small gate they had made through the city wall for just such a purpose. When she saw this trick she had been so angry that she had followed them, shouting to the men around her. Fifty-odd men had heard and followed, and then the Japanese had suddenly surrounded them and taken them captive and carried them along to an old temple just outside the capital.

Now in this prison she shouted suddenly, "I shall not rest until I have recaptured the capital city itself! I swear to the god of this temple where we are now held that I shall restore the temple to him as I shall restore this province to the people!"

Time after time she had sworn to do a thing and it was done. But never had she sworn so large a thing as this. Her men now looked at her, whether with doubt or belief she could not tell in the darkness, except that no one spoke.

"Do not forget," she went on, "that there are only fifty and a few more of us here behind this gate. Left behind us are two thousand men free, a thousand in the city we retook, where they will have the enemy's stores of ammunition. A thousand remain in the hills. When I do not return, they will not stand idle."

GOLDEN FLOWER

She thanked her own wisdom silently that she had yielded to none of the men who had besought her, the young men of her band, to Ling the Tiger-Clawed, to Kao the Killer, to Wang the Buffalo, to Pan the Lion-Tamer. There were too many of them for jealousy. Each had come to her secretly and begged her to live with him in a double tent. But she had refused them all, using her loyalty as a widow as her excuse. In her heart she knew that Big Stupid, dead or alive, had been nothing to her. In her heart she knew that what she really wanted was not one of these men of her own bandit clan, these men whom she knew as a mother knows her children. She wanted a man to whom she could give lifelong love. What sort of a man this must be she did not know, because she had never known such a man. But that was the way she put it to herself — "I must be able to love a man with a lifelong love." So she had not yielded to anything less. Her tent remained a single tent, where she slept with only an old farm-wife for companion, an ancient woman whose husband had been killed by Big Stupid in one of his village raids. The next day the wife had come toiling into the hills and she had stood up sturdily before Big Stupid and said :

"Since you have killed the man who was my rice-bowl, I am come to you to be fed."

And Golden Flower, then a young and tender girl, in the beginning of her years with Big Stupid, had liked her and begged for her, and so she had remained ever since. She alone dared to talk with Golden Flower about the young men.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Yield to no man," she told Golden Flower. "When a woman yields, she loses herself. That which is she is gone when a man takes it in his hands. . . ."

Now in this prison Golden Flower thought how well it was that she had not yielded. For had she done so, that one would have set himself up in her absence to be chieftain of her bandit clan. Only these days they called themselves guerrillas and no longer bandits. Now since none would allow the place of chieftain to another in her absence, they would devote their thought and planning to her.

"There will come a way of escape," she told her imprisoned men confidently. "All we must do is to be quick to see it. When our comrades put forth a hand in the dark, we must have our own ready to meet it. Meanwhile, we wait."

She could tell by her intuition that the men were beginning to believe her again. So often she had to bully them, persuade them, coax, and command them, that she could feel like an atmosphere the state of their minds. Upon the chill of apathy she had learned to pour the warmth of her own determination until from great mutinous silent beasts they turned, half unwillingly, to obedience again.

"Trust me," she said in her soft deep voice, "trust me — trust me! When I speak, agree, though you do not understand. I will lead you out of this prison. I promise it!"

One man after another stirred, rose, and stood as though she had called his name. And she held herself in that trance of compelling power over them. She could feel magnetism pouring out of herself over them. She knew what she was doing. By this same magnetism her father and her mother had compelled crowds of dazed people to believe that doves flew from their mouths, and bowls of water came from their sleeves, and fire went down their throats. But Golden Flower used it to make them believe in her, as she believed in herself. That was her secret — that she also believed.

GOLDEN FLOWER

It was at this moment that the prison gate was thrown open. For a second none of them knew what to expect. The sunlight poured in like a river and none of them could see.

“Are we to be killed already?” Golden Flower thought, startled. If so, then she must plan instantly a way to escape, and, failing that, a way to die, scorning death before those who brought it.

The Japanese soldiers were hustling them out, prodding them with their guns and pricking them with bayonets. What they said was unintelligible.

When her time came to go out she drew a little further over her eyes the broken visor of her cap. She was not afraid of being recognized as a woman. She looked, she knew, simply one of her own men. Her uniform was like theirs, her hair unkempt, her skin brown and dry. Miles of constant marching had kept her body as flat as a boy's, and under her uniform her small breasts were bound tightly to her body by a strip of strong cotton. Her feet were bare. Long ago she had learned not to look like a woman. Some day, perhaps, when she found her lifelong love — but certainly not here could she dare to look like a woman. She took care to keep in the midst of her men. She knew the brutality of the Japanese toward captive Chinese women. If she died she would die as a man. And her men, seeming to understand this, kept about her closely, their faces made stupid and impassive.

TODAY AND FOREVER

But they were not to die. Instead they were herded and driven into the central courtyard of the temple. She remembered it perfectly because here she and her parents had often come in the New Year holidays to perform their tricks. Around this great space she had leaped on and off her barebacked pony, now swinging by her legs under its belly, now standing on its back, now clinging by one hand to its mane. She had never dreamed, with all her knowledge of fortune-telling, that this would be her future now, to walk here a prisoner of the Japanese.

And for what end? Suddenly they were pushed forward. What was it? Then, to her bewilderment, she saw a dozen of her own men from the hills standing there in the middle of the court, her free men. How had they come here? They made no sign of recognition, and she made none, and the men with her made none. The Japanese soldiers hurried their prisoners forward. She saw a fat old Japanese general sitting on a campstool. Beside him was a young and slender Japanese man holding not a gun but a camera. She knew what a camera was, because the band had once captured a white man who had one, and he took pictures of them all to amuse them and to ingratiate himself with them. But Big Stupid had killed him, nevertheless, because his feet were tender and he could not keep up with the marching. She had always felt sorry for him and had kept as a curiosity the picture he had taken of her.

Then she saw what they had been brought to see. On the tiles in the middle of the court lay a pretty woman, dead. She was the wife of the puppet magistrate in the city they had retaken. Golden Flower recognized her at once, because yesterday she had killed her. It had been easy because the woman was lying asleep on her bed. There Golden Flower had come upon her as in triumph she had pressed on through the puppet magistrate's palace, ahead of her men who delayed in the outer rooms for loot. She had crept close to the sleeping one and had admired her prettiness. It was sad so pretty a woman was a traitor. Even so, it would be a pity to spoil her, she had thought. So she had taken her little needle-fine dagger and simply pressed it into the woman's left temple. When she drew it out, she wiped away the few drops of blood and went on.

GOLDEN FLOWER

But her quick brain left yesterday's deeds. Why was this woman here? Her own men must have brought her. They had known who she was when they had found her dead, after Golden Flower herself had been captured. It had happened all within a few moments yesterday. But there was no reason why these Japanese should know the dead woman. They were all men, and they could not have seen a lady, hidden properly in her own apartments in her husband's house. The hand, she thought swiftly — the hand stretched out in the dark—

Tani, the young Japanese standing with his camera beside General Seki, knew he ought to be glad that Golden Flower was dead. They had been trying to kill her for the last eleven months. Of all guerrilla troops that harassed the Japanese army of occupation in this region, the men who followed Golden Flower were the worst. Hundreds of good Japanese soldiers were dead because of this woman upon whose body he was now gazing. They had not been killed in hundreds. Golden Flower was too clever for that. Everybody knew her men were nothing but ordinary peasant bandits whom she had collected about her after her bandit lover had died. But Japanese sentries here and there had dropped at their posts, and no one could find out how bullets had reached them. Japanese scouting parties were met by a handful of wild-looking dark-faced men and killed; garrisons in captured towns were attacked by night, and when they tried to call reinforcements, all wires were cut and there was nothing to do but die. It went on thus, today ten men, tomorrow twenty, until General Seki had grown infuriated with the drain, dribbling but constant, upon his army of occupation, the more especially as after each foray he found somewhere, against a wall, or upon a dead man's heart, the small gold-washed metal flower which was the sign of the Golden Flower.

TODAY AND FOREVER

So when yesterday the small city of Tunghsing had been recaptured by the guerrillas of Golden Flower and the newly set-up magistrate killed, General Seki fairly swelled with rage.

"Dead or alive!" he roared. "Ten thousand yen to anyone who will bring me Golden Flower!"

Now only a day after he ordered this written down and had it pasted on city walls and gates and upon the earth walls of farmhouses, Golden Flower's body had been brought into the gate of the temple.

Here it now lay. The noon sunlight poured upon the slender body. She had died, it could be seen, of a tiny wound in the left temple. It seemed scarcely to have bled, or if it had bled, someone had wiped the blood away. Certainly it had not marred her beauty. Tani, moving forward among his comrades as they gathered about the body of the woman who had been such a menace to them all, could scarcely believe this was she. She was rather tall for a woman, but otherwise delicate and feminine. There were gold rings in her ears, and on her first finger a jade ring. Her feet had been bound in her youth, in the strange Chinese fashion, but later unbound, so that they were almost natural, but she wore old-fashioned satin shoes. The face, so youthful in peace, was exquisite. The eyes were closed, the long black hair had come loose from its binding of silk net, and though the flesh had now grown waxen, upon the full lower lip was still a bold touch of red. It gave a living emphasis to a face otherwise porcelain.

GOLDEN FLOWER

The General spoke suddenly.

"What proof is there that this is she?" he demanded of Tani, who was the official interpreter because he could speak Chinese.

Tani turned to the handful of ragged and hungry-faced men who had brought her in.

"What is your proof?" he demanded.

The men looked at each other as though they did not understand. Then one of them said roughly :

"Have we not eaten with her and fought under her banner day after day? We know her as we know our mothers."

"Why have you killed her?" Tani asked.

These were brutish men, he thought, despising them because for the sake of money they had betrayed this woman who had led them. He felt contempt for them, even though they were only doing what the General had hoped they would. But then he had not expected Golden Flower to be so young and so beautiful and so much a woman. He would have said that she would have been like other Chinese girl soldiers whom he had seen taken captive, brown lean creatures scarcely to be distinguished from men in their uniforms.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"We are hungry," one of the men said.

"We are tired of this war," another said.

Tani translated this to General Seki, who looked pleased and stroked his stiff black moustache.

"Ask the prisoners also if they recognize their leader," he commanded.

Tani glanced at the prisoners whom they had taken yesterday. They stood close together, as though they were bewildered.

"You will recognize this woman," he said hurriedly. "Your own comrades have surrendered her to us. They will be given the reward and can go away free for what they have done."

They did not understand what he said, he perceived. They stood looking stupidly at the dead woman, as though they had never seen her before.

"She is Golden Flower," he added.

"Where is the mole that she had on her temple?" one of the men said to another suddenly in a low voice.

Tani was close enough to catch these words, muttered from one man to another. . . .

"Fools!" she thought passionately at this moment, and ground her teeth together. She pulled her broken visor down over the mole on her left temple and pushed her way from out of their midst. She must risk everything because they were such fools. She answered the man in her quick fresh voice:

"The wound has destroyed it, elder brother."

Tani looked toward this voice at once. It was an unusual voice, low and firm, and yet the youth who possessed it was young.

GOLDEN FLOWER

"It is Golden Flower!" this boy insisted. "I saw her every day, and it is she!"

He was not speaking to Tani, but to his fellow captives. Tani saw only the glimpse of his profile as he turned his head. Among the captives eye caught eye, face turned to face. No expression changed. They looked stupid and uncomprehending enough. And yet when the young man declared, "It is Golden Flower!" each agreed. "Golden Flower — it is she——" "Golden Flower — Golden Flower."

"What are the demons saying?" General Seki demanded of Tani.

"Sir, only that this is indeed Golden Flower," he replied.

"Of course it is," the General said in his harshest and most complacent manner. "Haven't I just told them?"

"Yes, sir," Tani said obediently.

Yet although obedience was a habit to him, it did not now keep him from an astounding discovery. The young man had turned around now, and Tani saw for the first time his full face. It was a young fresh face, full of life and vivacity in spite of the torn guerrilla uniform of blue cotton and the bare feet. Under a ragged blue cap with a broken visor this face looked out at Tani. He felt himself grow dizzy with unreality. For the face was the face of the dead woman, a chance likeness, yet the same face, though alive with spirit and daring.

"Take the prisoners back," General Seki said suddenly. "I am hungry."

He rose from the campstool, yawned, and patted his belly. Instantly the soldiers began to hurry the prisoners together.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Give to the men who have surrendered their reward and food," General Seki added. "But let them be put for the night with the prisoners, until tomorrow, when we will have investigated everything. If all they say is true, quarters can be arranged."

The prisoners marched away. The boy with the broken cap was the last. Tani, still staring at him, caught his eye.

"Poor Golden Flower!" the boy said, and smiled an impudent smile. While Tani still stared, the boy managed to walk away as though he were not chained.

"Take that body out to be burned," the General shouted harshly from half-way across the court.

Tani ran to him and spoke, saluting.

"Should we not take photographs," he asked breathlessly, "lest we be asked from above for proof when we make the report?"

The General paused to consider.

"You are right," he said, "though I was about to think of it myself. Make the photographs clear and large to accompany my report."

He stood a moment, considering further. He was not pleased that Tani as a subordinate had suggested something so necessary as photographs. But he could think of nothing more to order. Besides, he was tired as well as hungry. He was heavy, and the hot Chinese summer was hard to bear, especially when he had the vexation of these guerrillas who were like vicious gnats, striking in the least expected places, knowing by some evil magic of their own where for a moment a place was undefended. It would be better now this woman chieftain was dead. It had been infuriating that a woman could so evade capture as this one.

GOLDEN FLOWER

"Dead or alive, though," he said to himself with a chuckle. "Men or women, I get them in the end!"

Tani heard the chuckle and looked up, startled. But the general only waved his hand imperiously.

"Go on — go on——" he commanded without explanation.

So Tani went back and dropped to one knee that he might turn his lens full upon the face, and then he focused carefully, so that he would have the picture he wanted.

In his little dark-room that same afternoon Tani could not work quickly enough in the developing of his pictures. He dipped each film into the fluid, rinsed it, and hung it up to dry. In the darkness he sat down and remembered the young man's face, turned to him for that moment of impudent smiling. In his whole somewhat unimaginative life it seemed to him this was his most exciting moment. Even the night when he received his orders to sail for China had not been so exciting. He had been to war before in Manchuria, and he knew that if war was prosaic in its beginning, it was even more so in its carrying on. A man followed petty orders day after day without knowing what they meant. If he were killed, death in obedience was prosaic, too.

But such imagination as he had was already stirred weeks ago by Golden Flower, by her daring, her wild history, her success in every raid. She had been so invincible through all these months that he was startled and then ashamed when he felt a certain sorrow in himself today on seeing her body brought into the temple court by the ragged dusty rascals who were her followers. Remembering this, he excused himself somewhat now. Assassins, that was what such men were, he thought. Outlaw and enemy that she was, that she should have been killed by her own men violated his deepest decency. He felt relieved when he recognized this familiar decency. It was not that he was disloyal in wishing an enemy alive again, but simply that even to an enemy he wished a decent death.

TODAY AND FOREVER

And then he thought with a vague tenderness of her helplessness as she had lain there dead before them all. Doubtless they had fallen upon her unawares, the men whom she trusted. And those others, the captives, they, too, had agreed it was she. But they had not mourned. They had simply stared at her stolidly and agreed when the young man made his declaration.

Then he remembered that smile the young man gave him. Tani rose. The thing he did not like about the Chinese was that they laughed so much and so easily, not polite laughter, but hearty simple laughter, such as children love to make. And yet they were not simple. There was nothing simple, for instance, about that young man. The look in his face had been knowing and wise in spite of its merriment.

Well, photographs would be proof. There might have been something tricky in his mind at the moment, an illusion of likeness because of his concentration upon the dead face. But photographs had no illusions. He rose from the bench where he was sitting and lit a candle and then with nervous fingers lifted the first developed picture. There was the dead woman's face, brilliantly clear in the sunlight, perfect in its detail. He studied it carefully, the light falling across the smooth surface. There was no trickery here.

GOLDEN FLOWER

Allowing for the difference between life and death, the two faces were the same, the dead woman's and the young man's. On every picture, as he picked up one after the other, they were the same. He felt gathering upon him the shadow of a tremendous obligation. He must go and report to General Seki the resemblance he had discovered. What it meant he did not know. But then it was perhaps not his business to know, merely to report. Solemnly he prepared to do his duty.

The whole thing might have turned out differently for Tani had his soul not been meticulously Japanese. For as he combed his hair and put on a fresh uniform that afternoon preparatory to visiting the General after he awoke from his usual nap, it occurred to him before he went that perhaps he was still mistaken in his memory, not this time of the dead face, but of the living one. Since he now had the dead face successfully held in a photograph, it would perhaps be well to compare it with the living face before he went to the General's headquarters. For this reason Tani went not directly to headquarters, but instead to the granary of the temple, which was the jail. The place had been chosen by General Seki as a prison because it had no windows. The thick high walls went sheer to the curved tile roof, and only the entrance doors needed to be reinforced with iron bars and guards. Guards with drawn bayonets stood now before the door as Tani drew near. But they knew him well enough as the General's interpreter and photographer and secretary, so they saluted and listened to his request.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Sir, shall we bring the young man here, or will you go in?" the sergeant inquired.

"I will go in," Tani said.

He had brought with him the small pocket flashlight with which every Japanese soldier is provided, and he intended to throw this intense pale light full upon the young man's face and in that clarity scrutinize its every feature.

He followed the sergeant therefore as he went to the gate. Behind him the bayonets of the guard closed into a shining metallic semicircle against the possible escape of a prisoner.

"The Chinese are like snakes," the sergeant explained. "They escape where one would say no living creature could escape."

Certainly no creature could escape such a barricade, Tani thought. And yet the sergeant did not open the gate more than the chain allowed, and it allowed only Tani's own person.

"I will follow, lest they treat you treacherously when they see you are alone," the sergeant said, squeezing through after him.

"I'm not afraid," Tani replied.

"I will stand here," the sergeant said stubbornly, and took up his place just inside the door.

At first Tani could see nothing. Then in a moment he began to see shapes in the darkness. With his coming, all talk, if there had been any, ceased, and the silence was absolute. The air of the closed building felt cool and damp after the dry hot sunshine outside, and the packed earth floor was slippery. There was a fetid odour of human waste.

He turned on his flashlight cautiously and with it picked out one face after the other. They were all wild faces, he thought with distaste. They met the light like animals, their eyes startled and opalescent, and then moved to escape it. None was the face he sought. He shifted the light back and forth, but the face was not there. Then he heard a secret repressed movement and felt that somehow the young man was being hidden from him, and instantly he grew angry.

GOLDEN FLOWER

"Throw the gates wide!" he ordered the sergeant in a whisper.

The sergeant hesitated. Then he shouted, "On guard!" and unhooking the heavy chain, he threw open the gate.

The afternoon sunlight streamed like a river into the dark room. It caught the huddled prisoners unaware, and they had no time to avoid it. The young man was on the outer edge of the two or three score of prisoners. He threw his arms about his head as though to protect himself. But it was too late. Tani had seen him.

He went over to him cautiously, while all the prisoners watched him, and took the young man's chin in his hand. It was a soft chin, the shape of it round and the skin upon it smooth. The young man, feeling his face thus upturned, closed his eyes. It was the one thing he could have done to make the likeness to Tani's photograph perfect. Tani's heart beat hard twice and then missed its beat. All uncertainty was gone. He released the young man's chin and went back to the gate and out into the air again.

"Is that all?" said the sergeant.

"That is all," Tani replied.

But it was not quite all. He thought of one more thing to inquire of the sergeant.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"When are these prisoners to be executed?" he asked.

"Sir, tomorrow morning," the sergeant replied.

When she felt her chin taken into her enemy's hand, she felt the blood in her veins stand still. She had no protection except not to let him see her eyes, lest he know the truth. She was scarcely less easy after a moment when he loosed her chin and went away. She sat waiting, as they were all waiting, for the other men to come in. If only she had not yielded to that foolish impulse of mischief when she turned in the courtyard! She had been frightened and ashamed ever since. Had any of the men seen her laugh? None of the prisoners, certainly, since she was behind them, but what of the others who had come to save her? Clever — clever — she could not herself have thought of a better trick to save herself! But then she had not seen the chance resemblance between herself and the woman she had killed yesterday.

The long afternoon wore on after the Japanese went away. Soldiers brought them thin rice soup and beans. But still no one spoke. She dared ask nothing of what had happened to the men who had pretended to surrender. If they did not come, then her smile had betrayed them. Would the young man have come to find her if she had not smiled and so made him uneasy? She put her own palm to her chin. Soft and round — a woman's chin, she thought in terror, and cursed herself. She could still feel his hand under her chin — a sensitive gentle hand, trembling a little. He was not like any of the men she had ever known. No, she told herself bitterly, he was the enemy, and she must not think of him. She must think of her men. Had she lost everything by her laughter?

GOLDEN FLOWER

He must, of course, go at once and tell the General that he strongly suspected — but if his suspicion was proved correct, they must strip the young man—— And what would be his fate then, supposing——

Tani rose abruptly from the campstool in his own room. He had come here instead of going to the General, and here he had been sitting for nearly two hours. It was not yet sunset. He would go for a little walk to clarify his brain so that he might see his duty clear again. Outside the temple he turned to the fields which the monks had once tilled to grow rice and cabbages on which to make their vegetarian fare. These fields were full of weeds now, but the pebbled paths still wound among them to a quiet spot where a brook flowed beneath willows. Tani had often gone there alone on his hours off duty instead of into the village with the soldiers. He went there now.

But this time it was different from any other, for now he had scarcely stepped into the shadow of the willows before hands reached out from nowhere and seized him. He was taken and tossed and held by some dark fellows, who said not one word as they worked. They took him as though he had been a child and stripped him of his uniform and tied him to a willow tree, and wove the branches about him so cleverly that one would have said he was part of the branchy trunk. Then they bound him under the chin around the tree with a sweaty girdle one of them took from his waist.

He had never been so alive, intensely alive, as he was now. He was terrified. Every nerve was bright with a life made sharp by terror, and his wits were livelier than he had ever felt them. He could feel them moving and aware of his predicament. There was so much surplus energy in him that as his wits worked he heard more vividly than he ever had heard in his life before the call of a distant harvest bird, the scraping of insects' wings in the leaves above his head. He said in Chinese, "You are the followers of Golden Flower."

TODAY AND FOREVER

In himself he was measuring the distance to the temple. If he shouted with all his strength — but long before his voice could reach the wall, that heavy hand-wrought dagger would have been in his breast.

"She is dead," a man said roughly.

"Then why do you want my uniform?" Tani asked. Strange how death, stared at, sharpened the brain of a living man! He saw clearly why they wanted his uniform. It was for her. He went on smoothly and quickly. "As for me, I am honoured if my poor garments will cover her. We admire her, too, though we are her enemies. A great spirit must be admired, though housed in a woman." He dropped his slightly grandiloquent tone. "Hurry, whatever you are about to do," he said. "The prisoners are to be killed tomorrow morning."

The man with the dagger lowered his hand. No one spoke. But in a second they were gone, seeming not so much to go as to disappear into the moving shadows. Then Tani was left alone to bear as best he could the strain of his body bent and bound upon the tree.

Whether or not he dreamed in his agony, whether or not he saw what he saw, he never knew. But, hours after sunset, in the cold and glittering moonlight when he hung fainting and choking, he seemed to be in the midst of a crowd of the dark men. They swarmed about him in their strange silence. He was shivering in his own sweat, icy in the damp night air. Mist rose from the brook and hung about the willows. And in this mist he seemed to see the dark faces. Yet he was not sure. Perhaps they were only faces in his brain. All his body was a long spear of pain, bent against a tree. A Christian god had died once like this. He had heard the story as a child and had despised the god because he cried out in his pain. He would not cry out. That was because he was Japanese. He fainted at this moment. Pain and everything were gone.

From this faint he waked in icy sweat to see the faces dark in white mist. But directly in front of him the early morning sun was shining on the mist in a bright space. And in that space he could see plainly. Or he thought he could until he realized that what he saw stupidly was his own uniform. Then he looked again, remembering. A face looked at him, young and grave, a face he knew. Or did he know it?

"He is shivering," a low voice whispered. The face smiled a little in his uncertain gaze. "Let him go," the voice said.

And in that instant hands reached out and set him free.

He could not stand. His legs melted and let him down to the earth. The mists rushed upward and took everything away from him again. Or was that sound of horses galloping a fainting dream? From nowhere there were suddenly horses. He was to remember as long as he lived seeing a slender straight figure in his own uniform throw itself across a horse and, sweeping past him, bend low as circus riders do, to fasten something to his heart and sweep on again. Then he fainted down toward death.

TODAY AND FOREVER

But he did not die. He was found by two serving-men who came out from the temple to throw waste into the flowing stream. They lifted him up and took him back. But he was not able to explain anything because he was still unconscious. He was therefore not aware of the confusion within the temple walls, or that no one had time to attend to him. The two servants laid him upon his bed and left him, merely going to the nearest sergeant to report having found him half-naked and unconscious beside the brook. They did not report the most important thing, because they did not see it.

But Tani himself was aware of it the moment he came swimming upward out of darkness toward light. He reached the small end of a funnel of light and was barely able to squeeze through it. But once through it, he was impelled toward the enlarging light of the other end of the funnel. When he was quite out of it he became conscious and he was aware that he was lying on his own bed. And in the mass of aches which was his body there was a small sharp pricking upon his left breast. It became intolerable and at last, groaning, he raised one numb hand and felt under the wet cotton vest he wore. His hand touched metal. He turned his blurry gaze downward. Something sharpened and focused that gaze. It was a small flower of gold whose metal points turned downward and pierced his flesh. He tore it off and held it hidden in his hand.

By the time the General sent someone to him he was able to drink a little hot saké. And soon he was able to listen to what they had to tell him. For in the excitement of what had happened in the temple the day before no one asked him any details of his own lowly adventure. It was to them merely a part of the whole miraculous day, though of course not to be understood either.

GOLDEN FLOWER

The real miracle was this. Last night after sunset, in the early moonlight, three hundred of the followers of the Golden Flower had come to the temple and surrendered themselves. Tani was still very weak. But these men, his comrades, crowded joyously into his room and he had to listen to them. Three hundred of the enemy, they said over and over, came of their own accord to surrender — all of them followers of Golden Flower.

"Where are they?" he asked.

"Waiting for General Seki," they said proudly. They had been in the prison for the night, pending examination this morning by the General. But there was no doubt of it. They had been there smiling this morning when the buckets of soft-cooked rice were taken in for their breakfast. And because of them, the General had postponed the executions which were to have taken place this morning, and had given all the prisoners a chance to surrender instead. All had surrendered. They had rushed out of the prison together in a happy body, shouting their surrender. Now they were in the courtyard waiting to see the General.

Tani's head was swimming with weakness. Voices hurled these words at him and he was barely able to catch them. But he caught them, and his brain began to struggle.

"But who was the dead woman?" he muttered.

His tongue was so stiff no one understood what he said, and he could not repeat the words. It did not matter after all if the dead woman were now ashes. Golden Flower was alive. His uniform had saved her. He saw drowsily how it must have happened. She had slipped away when they all rushed out together this morning, her Japanese uniform hidden among them. And who would notice an extra Japanese in a camp too full of them for them to know each other? A moment later a young Japanese had followed a company straggling through the gates to the temple threshing-floor to early morning drill. And horsemen had met her by the shadowy willow pool in the brook.

TODAY AND FOREVER

He held her emblem in his hand. He felt upon his breast the pricking of her wound. For a moment his imagination, never strong at best, fluttered and put forth weak wings. Suppose she had been a Japanese woman? But he could not imagine a Japanese woman leading bandit guerrillas, flying on horseback over hills, escaping from a prison — no, easier to imagine if he were a Chinese too. But he was a Japanese.

His imagination died. Duty — he had a duty waiting. He struggled to clarify duty in his clouded brain. Her men — never surrender — the whole thing a plot——

“Tell the General,” he said thickly, “I must see him — life and death——”

Back in the hills, Golden Flower stood upon the rock to which her feet clung by habit. She was talking to her men. She had slept a little, eaten, washed, and clothed herself in a fresh uniform of faded blue cotton. Her short black hair had been newly cut. She felt strong and herself again now that she had escaped — she felt she had known all along that she would escape. Her smile upon the Japanese had done no damage, after all. And she had pressed the tiny sharp points of her golden flower into the flesh of his breast. Now that she was free she regretted nothing, neither smile nor flower. He was a handsome man, that young Japanese — but still, a Japanese !

GOLDEN FLOWER

She put her hands on her cartridge belt and went on.

“ I shall never rest until we have taken back our capital, and our province,” she cried in a clear voice.

“ Ammunition — we need more ammunition,” they muttered. “ What we have is still not enough.”

She looked at them severely.

“ Why do you think I left three hundred and fifty men behind me ? ” she inquired. “ The Japanese have our ammunition.”

She stood at ease before them while they took this in. Then she went on.

“ When you have eaten, we will go back and attack the headquarters of that old turtle Seki himself. We will attack from without and those who are waiting for us will attack from within — all those who have surrendered ! ”

Suddenly she smiled, and like a flame set to a forest, her smile lit their laughter. They burst into simple hearty laughter, that laughter which if Tani had heard it he would have so hated because he could never comprehend its meaning.

Thus began again the war.

The Face of Buddha

TIMOTHY STAYNE could never tell anyone why he was living in an old temple outside the city of Tali, in the province of Yunnan in south-east China. He had been living there for ten years, ever since he was twenty-five years old. When people did not know him it was easy enough simply to let his being a missionary explain anything. It did explain anything when one apparently belonged to a small sect called The Apostolic Mission of Life and Healing. But as soon as he let anyone come to know him, and sometimes even after all these years against his better judgment he did, there would come that question which he dreaded. It began in various ways. An Englishman would say, "Look here, old chap, I don't mean to be curious, but—" A Frenchman would say, "Without doubt you lead a life of ravishing interest, but if I may ask—" And Americans would say, "I don't mean to butt in, but—" The end of the question, however begun, was always the same. In effect it was this, why does Timothy Stayne, heir to the Stayne millions, live in an old temple in Tali?

Tim answered the question according to his mood on the day it was asked. He might point from the temple terrace in the direction of the lake and its snow-encircled mountains. According to his nationality his questioner would express disbelief. There are lakes in America, in Switzerland, almost anywhere, in fact. If Tim reminded them of the Apostolic Mission, the disbelief varied from polite English smiles to loud American laughter. Who could take the Apostolic Mission seriously when in the main hall of the temple, which Tim had made into his living-room, there stood a large gold Buddha five times the size of a man?

THE FACE OF BUDDHA

"The old abbot made it the one requirement for renting the temple to me," Timothy explained. "He said the big Buddha must not be moved, or else bad luck would fall on Tali. I said if that were the case I would never move it."

What he could not explain, of course, was the feeling which had made him shape the decorations of the room around the handsome Buddha, so that whatever was said or done in the room seemed to be done in that powerful, inscrutable presence. For the Buddha was not gentle, though the huge golden face was smooth and amiable and one enormous hand lay palm upward upon the folded knee while the other was lifted as though in calm admonishment. The Buddha was too powerful for gentleness. Trivial persons in that room became uncomfortable sooner or later and disappeared from Tim's life without his having to trouble to dismiss them, and those who could continue themselves under that strong golden face he discovered were worth keeping as his friends. But this he found difficult to explain.

Difficult, too, to explain was the Buddhist chanting that floated through his rooms in the early morning and at sunset. Tim always said, and truthfully, that he had nothing to do with it. When he had first climbed the bamboo-draped hill upon which the temple was and had seen below him the blue lake and the black roofs of the city, and then, lifting his eyes, had stood face to face with the snow-topped mountains, he had immediately offered the ragged abbot at his elbow a rent which would make him and the three old priests independent for life. For there were fashions in temples in Tali, and just now Tali ladies were going to a big new temple in the city where the priests were young and handsome and where besides one did not have to pay to be carried up a mountain side in a rickety bamboo chair tied with frayed ropes to two poles. The reason they gave was that the big gold Buddha had grown old and careless about answering their prayers, and so they were going somewhere else for a while.

TODAY AND FOREVER

The abbot had been grateful and had grasped at the young American's offer on condition, he said, that the big Buddha was not moved from the east end of the main temple, and that he and his brother priests could keep for themselves the furthest small courtyard. They had nowhere to go in the world, having renounced their families so long ago that they must be forgotten. Moreover, they were here for sanctuary, and it would be embarrassing to them as old worshippers of gods to return to men and be tried for murder and one thing and another.

Tim, his eyes always on the lake, had agreed to everything. His only bad moment had been when the head of the Apostolic Mission from Tennessee had come to inspect him.

"You can't live with an idol in your own home," the excellent man had exclaimed.

THE FACE OF BUDDHA

"I find it strengthens my faith," Tim said quite truly.

"And those heathen priests!" the good man cried.

"They respect my faith," Tim replied.

Since Tim took no salary from the mission, the Reverend Joseph Bram said no more. He might have asked, "Why did you join a mission in the first place if you were going to live in a heathen temple?" But being a thoroughly earnest man it did not occur to him to ask such a question. He went away merely saying to himself that God worked in mysterious ways, and that this rich young man was one of the most mysterious he had ever seen.

Tim had, however, already asked himself this question many times. Why, if he had wanted to live where he could see the lake of Tali, did he not simply come here and live, since he was spending no one's money except his own? The answer to this was obscure and yet he had it. Marco Polo was the one who had first enticed him to Tali. At the bottom of the page upon which Marco Polo described a great city, in the second book and the fifty-ninth chapter, there had been a footnote saying that the city was Tali and the lake there of surpassing beauty. Tim had been eighteen the year he read it, the only child of a mother so gentle that she died when he was twelve, and a father so strong that it appeared he would live forever. Fred Stayne took it for granted that his son would go on with the munitions business.

The last thing Tim wanted to do was to manufacture anything, but he avoided saying so, because in a way of his own he was fond of his father. He found another escape, therefore.

TODAY AND FOREVER

Later in the same year he heard a white-haired missionary from China talk at chapel one Sunday evening. The man had lantern slides, but they were not very good and nobody had been much interested except himself, and he only because of Marco Polo. Then the man said something else to interest him.

"We believe in healing and in quiet persevering goodness."

The way he said it made Tim remember his mother, and afterwards he had gone up to talk, though none of the other boys did, and the old man had told him a little about China, and he remembered again that Tali was there. It occurred to Tim suddenly that if he said he wanted to be a missionary his father ought to understand his going to China to live, since his father was an elder in the church. His father had not understood as well as he had hoped, but by remaining quietly stubborn while his father expended his own stubbornness in fireworks of temper, Timothy had lived now ten years where he liked to live, troubled only by fits of feeling that maybe he ought to begin more definitely to be a missionary.

Otherwise the ten years had been satisfying. Nothing had happened for eight of them to make one different from another, and this was exactly what he wanted. He spent them in reading many books, in beautifying his home, and in coming to know desultorily the affairs and the people of Tali. Those people were also hopelessly confused by his living in the Bamboo Temple, and simply called him the White Priest.

The peace of those eight years ended sharply one night in late July in the year 1937. Tim had been spending the evening as he spent many of his evenings, in company with the old abbot, who had taught him to read and to write Chinese. They had been discussing astronomy since there was an unusual number of large and luminous falling stars in the pageant of sky before them.

THE FACE OF BUDDHA

"Falling stars," the old abbot was saying as they watched the elements, "are an evil omen of changing times. History tells us that every disaster to China has been presaged by great and brilliant falling stars." The abbot was an astrologer, as well.

At this moment one of the priests came to the round gate of the terrace on which they sat.

"What is it?" the abbot asked.

"The magistrate of Tali has come in haste up the mountain," the priest replied in agitation.

"Why, at this hour and after all these years?" the abbot inquired.

"He wishes to worship the big Buddha, because there is bad news from the northern capital," the priest replied.

"Will this disturb you?" the abbot asked Tim courteously.

"Not at all," Tim replied, without moving.

He had stayed where he was in the soft darkness and the magistrate had hastened in, his embroidered robes flying and his retinue trotting after him. He did not even see the American sitting quietly in the wicker chair near the edge of the terrace which seemed suspended against the sky. He went at once into the temple and ordered the red candles he had brought to be lit before the big Buddha, and the incense also, and that the silk cushion be put on the floor so that he could knock his head on it. He had expected the usual tiles of the temple floors and he paused in his prayers to comment on the extraordinary thickness and softness of Tim's carpet. Then he went on praying loudly, and, Timothy's Chinese by this time being excellent, he understood the prayer.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"O blessed Buddha, drive the Japanese dwarfs from the northern capital, but if they are not to be driven out let them have it. If they come to Shanghai, drive them out, O Buddha, but if they are not to be driven out let them have it. But they are not to come to Tali, O Buddha! If they do not come here, I will promise that this temple will be the richest and the most famous in the world. I will compel my people to worship the great gold Buddha. But if you let the Japanese hurt us by so much as the whiskers of our dogs, I will raze the temple and return you to yellow dust, O Buddha!"

Having thus prayed, the magistrate rose, remarked the fact that there was no dirt on his knees as there usually was after he had prayed in temples, and went away again.

This was the first Tim had heard of the Japanese invasion of China. The next time he heard of it was from his father in Philadelphia.

"The Japanese are at the moment our best customers," his father wrote. "I'm told the fighting will be in north China mainly, so you had better stay where you are."

There was nothing to be done about either Japan or his father. Tim spent a good deal of time thinking about them both, and some more time thinking about the extra millions he would one day inherit because so many Chinese were going to get killed by Stayne munitions. But there was nothing he could do about that either, though gradually he came to think about it night and day, and more and more. While he thought he sat in his living-room looking at the big Buddha. His houseboy had not taken away the magistrate's red candles or the incense, and Tim had not spoken about it, so they were still there. It was just as well, for now a number of people in Tali began to remember the big Buddha who had not thought of him for years, and they climbed the bamboo-shaded hillside to kneel there in Tim's living-room. The common people still went to newer temples, but Tim grew used to having to leave for a few moments while dignified old gentlemen in old-fashioned brocaded satin robes and white-haired ladies with their feet bound walked into his room, and ignoring him completely, lit the red candles before the Buddha and prayed always to the same end.

THE FACE OF BUDDHA

"Deliver us, O Lord of Heaven, from our enemies, the Japanese."

He heard these prayers and noticed their similarity and concluded that the Japanese must be winning the war. Mails, always slow to Tali, were now not to be depended upon at all, and when he saw a newspaper it was so old that it was not worth reading. This, which had always been one of the blessings of Tali, now became an inconvenience, and he began anxiously to wish that something could be done about the Japanese. He spent a good deal of time sitting in his comfortable chair beneath the golden eyes trying to think if there was anything he could do, and he could think of nothing.

It was while he was thus sitting one night that the abbot came in. After the formula of courtesy had been completed and Wang the houseboy had brought in tea, the abbot said calmly, merely as if it were common news :

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Have you heard we are to have a new road through Tali?"

"No," Tim said. There had been nothing new in five centuries near Tali.

"The old silk route to India is to be cleared and brought into use again," the abbot said. "The road our ancestors used to carry on their trade with Greece and Persia and Egypt. It has been forgotten for centuries. Now where camels once walked loaded with silks there will be trucks."

"Not for silk," Tim said.

"Not for silk," the abbot agreed.

By this time Japan was taking one port after another on the coast and stopping China up like a bottle.

"Then the bottom is knocked out of the bottle," Tim said.

"If you wish to put it so," the abbot agreed, "or you might say the back gate is opened, or a bridge let down, or a hole chopped through the Great Wall."

"Ah," Tim said, thinking.

He sat silently thoughtful for so long that the abbot saw that Tim wanted him to go and so he went, Tim following him to the edge of the terrace and begging him to stay. The abbot smiled and bowed.

"There is no doubt that in some earlier life you were one of us," he remarked. "The Buddha has merely reincarnated you as you are now for his own purposes."

But still Tim's thought led nowhere for the moment. The new road began to appear beyond the walls of Tali, a scar of raw earth in the midst of fields tended and made green by generations of human hands. It stung his imagination but brought him no inspiration.

THE FACE OF BUDDHA

And then late one afternoon, returning from a walk he had made to inspect the new road, he stopped on the threshold of the old temple. He heard a strong young voice crying out a new sort of prayer.

"O Buddha, give me ten thousand guns! American guns, not the old-fashioned long-handled ones, but the short strong ones that shoot quickly!"

Tim was astounded. What could even Buddha make of this? He looked through the wide doorway and saw before the image a young Chinese man in the short blue jacket and trousers of a peasant. He was unusually tall and strong, and he turned his head and returned Tim's look with bold black eyes.

"Don't let me interrupt you," Tim said apologetically.

"I have finished," the young man said. "If as Buddha's priest——"

"I am not Buddha's priest," Tim said hastily, "but I could not help hearing what you want. Who are you?"

"Men call me the Yellow Wolf," the young man said, as casually as though he were anyone.

Tim concealed his inward start. "I have heard of you," he said.

"Everyone has," the young man replied without pretence of modesty. "I have fifteen thousand good fighting men in my band, and five thousand rifles we have taken from government soldiers we have vanquished from time to time. Now we will fight the Japanese instead of the soldiers. But first we must have more rifles."

It was true that everyone in Tali knew the Yellow Wolf, but few had seen him and no one knew who he was. At the head of any who cared to follow him he had marauded the countryside.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Will it not be difficult for Buddha to find ten thousand American rifles?" Tim inquired delicately.

"Buddha has ways," the young man said as simply as ever.

Tim had come in as they talked, and now they stood directly beneath the gaze of the huge golden figure. That figure which could so dwarf an ordinary man did not diminish this one. The Yellow Wolf stood at ease, erect and careless and full of daring. Involuntarily Tim looked up to the golden face. He was not in the least superstitious, and he knew that Buddha was made of yellow Tali clay covered with gold leaf. That the huge statue was so beautiful was merely the chance of the yellow clay having fallen to the hands of an unknown great sculptor instead of to an ordinary idol-maker. Nevertheless, as the young man had talked and he had listened, he had felt something pressing into his brain gently and firmly. It was an idea, and now as he looked into the eyes of the big Buddha this idea sprang suddenly clear and open like a lotus flower in the sun.

Tim resisted it steadily. "I couldn't possibly do it," he said aloud and in English to the golden face.

"What is that?" the young man inquired in Chinese.

"Your prayer can scarcely be answered," Tim said cautiously. "What if the guns were not used against the enemy but against the people of Tali?"

"Buddha knows my heart," the young man said after a minute's silence and without another word he went away. Tim, following out of pure curiosity, saw him stride through the courts as though he knew them all, and then pause at the last one to speak to someone. It was the old abbot. Through the vista of gates Tim saw the two take each other's hands.

THE FACE OF BUDDHA

familiarly and stand, hand holding hand, to talk. Then with a nod the young man was gone.

Accustomed as he was to live in surrounding mystery, this, Tim told himself, was mystery made more mysterious. But he did not go to the old abbot who stood in the distance, watching the Yellow Wolf go springing through the bamboos to the top of the mountain. It was evening, indeed, before Tim, having sat out the afternoon in thought, went to find the abbot in his cell. The old man was working out a horoscope.

"Can you," Tim said abruptly, "as the representative of Buddha, guarantee the Yellow Wolf?"

"In the matter of guns?" the abbot inquired.

"Exactly," Tim said.

The abbot peered at certain symbols he had been putting down on paper with his pointed camel's-hair brush.

"It is clear here," he said, "that the Yellow Wolf will become a famous general, and he will be pardoned by the government for all his sins."

"And you?" Tim inquired.

"I will swear for him," the abbot said, and added, "for Buddha, of course."

"In that case," Tim said thoughtfully, "I will get my cane and go into the city. The snakes come out at night."

"Do," the abbot replied.

Tim, returning, paused for one second to look up at the golden face. There was no change upon it and he went on.

He went down the winding stone-paved mountain road. The moonlight was very fine, and he needed no lantern. When he reached the city wall, the gate was locked, but he pulled a string, and a little wicket opened and the watchman peered out.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Ah, the White Priest," he said and drew back the great wooden bar and swung the gate open enough to admit Tim's slender frame.

Tim gave him a coin and went down the quiet narrow city street to the small telegraph office and wrote a cable to his father.

"If I can get a contract from a friend will you sell at same price as to enemies stop Tim."

He waked the clerk who was asleep on the table, and the little man read the words loudly without understanding one of them, for he was proud of his high-school English.

"Right," said Tim.

Two days later he had his father's reply.

"Why not stop Cash stop Love, Dad."

"Meet Brownell in Lashio," his father cabled two weeks later. "Send cash."

Tim had forgotten how Americans did things. He had been making chrysanthemum cuttings on the terrace and thinking about the Yellow Wolf when a panting coolie brought him the cable. He stuffed the cable in his pocket and planted the chrysanthemums at furious speed — he'd want them later — and then rushed down to the telegraph office.

"Personally responsible for cash," he cabled.

The next day he and Wang set out for Burma along the new road. That new road now swept over the countryside like the wake of a storm, missing Tali by a few miles. People had never seen such a road. It grew leagues, or so it seemed, in a few days. Actually there were thousands of small dust-coloured creatures who worked upon it like mites, ragged men and women without machinery. Their hoes and little baskets on bamboo poles were no more than toys, but somehow they pushed the road open before them steadily and swiftly. It was finished enough, indeed, for trucks, Tim saw sharply from the old roadster he had bought at a blacksmith's shop in Tali, though it was dangerous too, new, untried, driven through rocks above cliffs and twisting and turning in horrible curves into valleys ; still it was possible — that is, for four days. In the rumble sat Wang with the tin food-box. Twenty times in an hour Tim caught in the mirror the picture of Wang's terrified face bouncing upward.

THE FACE OF BUDDHA

"Came down all right, didn't you?" he would call after a bump.

"All right," Wang always piped, resolutely.

But before they reached Burma they had to leave the car. The road stopped as abruptly as though there was its end, and ahead stretched a great bog across which Tim could not see, though he climbed up and stood on the car. Upon the bog the small creatures still worked, but now half naked and sick with heat. Even as he watched he saw one drop here and another there. They did not rise. He climbed down from the car and stood upon a crust of the black earth which shook under his feet. A sickly Chinese in uniform came slowly toward him. Under his muddied helmet his sunken eyes were shining with fever.

"Can I get through?" Tim asked.

"Not by car," the man replied. "Not yet. But you can go twenty miles by foot, and the road begins again."

"Can I go by foot easily?"

"Yes, but do not sleep. This is the tiger country of Shweli. If a man stops sickness falls on him and sleep kills him."

TODAY AND FOREVER

Tim went back to his car. "Come on, Wang," he said, "we'll have to leave the car and walk awhile."

Wang got out and tied the food-box to his back with his long blue girdle and Tim pulled the car to the bank, locked it, and they set out. A footpath, barely to be seen, led toward the jungle beyond the bog.

. . . The dancing torrid heat clung like slime about his body. He saw or thought he saw snakes hanging from trees, snakes crawling under his feet, snakes writhing around rocks. But if there had not been so many snakes, he would have had to sleep even though he remembered that sleep was death. Now and then he remembered Wang and turned to look behind him.

"All right, Wang?"

"All right," Wang piped, his eyes popping and his face streaming with sweat.

The air was solid. It packed itself about them, wet, immobile. He had to force his way as though he were walking through water. It took them eleven hours to do the twenty miles. On the other side they bargained with the driver of a truck returning to Lashio, crawled into it, and slept on green watermelons. They were tossed for hours over a violent rough road and then in Lashio had to be shaken awake.

". . . Black malaria," Brownell told him in the small Lashio hotel. Brownell was his father's head man in Singapore and he had brought the shipment to Lashio, wondering if his chief in U.S.A. had gone crazy. This had been his state of mind while he waited for young Tim as his orders told him to do. Young Tim as everybody knew was certainly crazy. He'd been locked up in a Chinese temple for years. That he had locked himself up only made him more crazy. "You're lucky to have got through," he told Tim. "A mosquito so small you can't see it gives you a couple of bites, and in a little while, a day or two maybe, you drop dead."

THE FACE OF BUDDHA

"That so?" Tim replied. He was thinking of the bog upon which those listless creatures worked, dropping here and there to die. The road would never be finished if it were left only to them. Some of them had had no hoes or shovels. They had cleared the earth into baskets with their bare hands. Seven days, the overseer had said. Well, perhaps it might be seven days. The whole road had been a miracle so far, but another miracle would have to finish it.

"It'll be a few days anyway before that big hole is ready for trucks," he told Brownell.

"From what I hear from fellows waiting to get through it's been quite a few days already," Brownell retorted. "My orders are to deliver to you and get back."

"All right, then, deliver!" Tim replied.

He found himself immediately the owner of a fortune in American rifles for which he had to pay cash to Stayne and Company, U.S.A.

"Glad I'm the son and heir," he thought as he wrote his cheque. It was the first time in his life he had been glad. He spent ten days rounding up trucks and drivers and on the morning of the eleventh was ready to start. He was proud of the caravan of trucks, though the drivers looked like bandits. Lashio was full of old trucks and banditti drivers who owned them. To drive a truck along the Burma Road was to make a fortune nowadays and was better than banditry. When the road went through finally, if it ever did, two trips would make a man rich for life. The drivers were in high spirits.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Ready?" Tim shouted.

"Ready!" they shouted back in a chorus of many tones, and they left Lashio with tooting horns and yells.

This caravan now clattered behind Tim as he came to the bog and saw what had happened in those eleven days. The bog had moved on, that was all. Over the miles where he and Wang had staggered on foot there was a broad stretch of black mud, a bottomless swamp. A little man in a muddied white uniform came toward him. Under his helmet his eyes were shining with fever.

"How many days before we can get through?" Tim asked in Chinese.

The man answered in perfect English. "We say seven days. But we replace our men every few days because they die so quickly. Now they refuse to come, knowing that if they do they will die."

"You weren't here when I came through," Tim said.

"I replaced another, and another will replace me," the man said.

"Looks as though we'd have to wait," Tim said.

"There are many who wait," the man replied and went to his post, and Tim turned the caravan back to the last village inn.

The red candles and the incense were still before the big Buddha but they were dusty. The magistrate would not come back until it was clear the Japanese were not going to bomb Tali. It was certainly not clear yet, because they were bombing the capital of the province, which was no distance away. There had been some rumour of the Yellow Wolf's fighting them, but nothing had come of it. Indeed, the Yellow Wolf had merely been bolder than usual. There were those who had seen the band too near Tali for comfort.

THE FACE OF BUDDHA

"He knows I must keep my soldiers for my own protection," the magistrate groaned. Under the circumstances he had felt it was scarcely worth climbing the mountain again to remind Buddha of his threat, and gradually everyone stopped going, feeling now that what must happen would happen. And so the dust grew about the image.

The old abbot had the key to Tim's living-room, and if he had been well he would have gone in himself to dust the Buddha ; but he was ill, and he would give the key to none of the priests. Two of them had once been robbers who had taken sanctuary to escape having their heads cut off. As a mere murderer himself, he felt he could not trust them with Tim's possessions, when they wanted to know if they should not at least go in and dust off the big Buddha once in a while.

"Buddha will not care," he told them. "He knows that dust is the end of us all," and he kept the key in the folds of his dirty inner girdle.

But the old abbot upon his bed had been disturbed by bad dreams for several days. Usually he could cope with any trouble by smoking a little opium, but this time the dreams were stronger than the opium. He grew so annoyed by them finally that he got up and walked feebly about his room. The sun was shining so clearly through the paper lattices of the window that he went out into the courtyard. But he was still oppressed. The horoscope he had been working on would not come out to its proper end. He could not bring it past an obscure danger point, the cause for which he could not understand.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"I'll go and pray to the big Buddha," he told one of the old monks who sat in the sunshine hunting the lice out of his robe. "I am disturbed in my spirit."

"Pray for me," the monk replied absently, his mind on an insect that eluded him.

But the abbot did not pray for anyone. He went into Tim's living-room and lit the candles and the incense before the big Buddha and then drew Tim's American leather chair quite close to the altar, and sat down in it to discover what was wrong. And after sitting there awhile his disturbance clarified itself. Tim was in trouble, and the Yellow Wolf's destiny depended on Tim. The more he thought about this the more his disturbance settled about it as a certainty. He felt relieved. If one could find the cause of a disturbance it could be cured. He must find Tim. Then, being economical, he pinched out the candles and the incense with his thumb and forefinger.

"O mi to fu," he said to the Buddha. He felt much better. Besides, a trip would do him good.

He set out the next day with his begging-bowl and his staff, and in his girdle Tim's last month's rent and the living-room key. If the magistrate wanted to worship Buddha it would be impossible. But it was not likely. The Japanese had bombed Kunming again and their armies were advancing. Bombs could be avoided by crawling into the belly of the earth, but how could one escape armies? He set out on foot, walking with a limp he exaggerated slightly. As soon as he reached the new road a bus stopped, as he expected it would, since it is good luck to help a priest.

THE FACE OF BUDDHA

"A ride, Priest?" the driver inquired.

"Buddha provides," he replied gratefully, and got in.

"I could of course have sent my soul to you only," the abbot told Tim. "It would have been simpler. But I wanted a trip. I had never been on a bus."

They sat under a palm tree near the village just beyond the tiger country of Shweli. Tim had retreated to wonder whether the rest of his life would be spent here with his trucks. Meanwhile he had ordered two thousand shovels with bamboo handles from the local blacksmith, and the man and his apprentices were working day and night. At least these fragile swiftly-dropping men would not have to scrape the miles of earth with their bare hands.

"Anyway, I am glad you have come," Tim said. "How are my chrysanthemums?"

"I pinched the buds myself," the abbot replied. "When you return they should be at their best."

"If I don't return, they are yours," Tim said. "I need not tell you, who have just travelled the great bog on foot, that American trucks can cross it no more than as if it were an ocean. And men drop dead before they can remove ground enough for their own graves."

"Ah," said the abbot, "we need The Women."

"What women?" Tim asked.

But the abbot did not answer. He was thinking, and thought was deepening into trance. His eyes grew hazed and he turned in upon himself. Tim waited. He knew that mood when the abbot seemed to curl in toward his own soul, his hands curling, his feet, his head shrinking between his shoulders, all his body curling into itself. The abbot might stay thus for a few minutes or for hours. Tim waited half an hour and then he tiptoed away. He went to the village where his trucks were lined up just outside the inn where he had a dirty room, and examined them. Nothing, so far as he could see, was gone. He had drawn with whitewash upon the cases an intricate pattern of chrysanthemums, and as a touch of irony had made them the sacred imperial chrysanthemums of Japan, each with thirteen petals. The pattern was unbroken by theft. No one knew yet what was in the cases. He had lied simply when people asked him what was in the cases.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Books," he had said.

When he went back to the palm tree the abbot was gone. Tim looked for him now and again for two days, but he was not to be found. He gave up looking for him then because he had to give up everything to plan how to save the trucks. A new danger had come. On the afternoon of that hot September day he felt a rush of panic creep swiftly over the countryside like an instantaneous epidemic. The shops along the single street of the little village put up their shuttering boards, and one by one people closed their houses. By mid-afternoon the street and the alleys were bare, and everyone was shut into the dark steaming heat of his own court.

Tim, walking back from a hill-top from which in the distance he could see the stagnant road, was astonished at the blank and empty streets. He had left them full of lazy, contented people, selling a little, buying a little, and talking and laughing a great deal. Now he saw no one. When he entered the courtyard of the inn, the fat innkeeper was waiting for him.

THE FACE OF BUDDHA

"It will be better for you to move away from this miserable inn, sir," he said.

"Why?" Tim asked, surprised.

"Other guests are coming," the innkeeper said unhappily.

"I have been here a long time," Tim said gently. He understood that for some reason, sudden and strange, he was unwanted. But he had no intention of moving.

"I neglected to tell you," the innkeeper said, "but before you came your rooms were occupied by a man with the smallpox."

"I am not afraid of smallpox," Tim told him.

"It was leprosy," the innkeeper replied.

Wang, clutching the food-box, made his face hideous with meaning and nodded toward the privacy of Tim's room. Tim went in, and Wang followed him.

"Sir, the truth is bandits are coming."

"Bandits?" Tim repeated. Bandits, of course, were everywhere, but why here and now?

"They think there is treasure in the cases," Wang said.

Tim nodded. Comprehensible, but his trucks were not for these bandits.

"I shall go out to meet them," he now told Wang. "I'm an American. They can't take my stuff."

Wang looked uncertain. "Ordinary bandits might listen to a white man," he said, "but these are The Women. They listen to no man."

TODAY AND FOREVER

"You mean women bandits?" Tim demanded. One reason why he kept on living in China was that no one knew what could happen next. He had seen so few Chinese women that they were almost a myth to him — peasants who ran when they saw him, a stout matron at a market-place buying meat and vegetables, women beggars, pocked and blind, a young girl in a doorway who was gone when he looked at her.

"I mean The Women!" Wang said stubbornly.

Tim wanted to laugh. "If they are only women," he said, "then all this is nonsense. Go and tell the innkeeper that in my country we are not afraid of women."

Wang went but what he said was, "My master is the son of the chief governor who sits next to the King in America. He has a royal seal around his neck. It is magic. When The Women come he will walk out alone and talk with them and if they do not listen to him he will destroy them."

"Has he also magic guns?" the innkeeper asked.

"He wears two inside his shirt," Wang replied. He had discussed with Tim the advisability of a gun of his own when they set out on this absurd journey.

"I don't want a gun," Tim had said.

"Why, sir?" Wang inquired.

"Because I don't want ever to be put in the position of having to kill somebody," Tim had replied.

This, Wang knew, was insanity, and now he kept it secret.

"Since he has two guns, and if he has magic,"

THE FACE OF BUDDHA

the innkeeper said, "he may stay, though I am responsible for nothing."

But he went out and spread the word to the villagers to quiet them. They had been clamouring at him to strangle Tim quietly and to send word to The Women that the whole thing had been a fable, since there was no American and no treasure. When Tim was dead they could open the boxes themselves.

"It is well to let him try his magic," the innkeeper said, "since we have none strong enough for The Women."

. . . Tim, that night, creeping through moonlit jungle toward the edge of the bog, paused. There was little use, he thought to himself with a grin, in trying to be quiet when he smelled loudly enough for anybody to know he was around without even opening their eyes to see him. He had covered himself with a mixture of lard and eucalyptus oil; this was against the deadly mosquito bites. His sweat, struggling against the grease, made him feel he was encased in rubber. Now he crouched under a low-growing tree, having first searched the moss beneath it with his flashlight for snakes.

He believed not a word of this whole business, but he had given his promise and he had come out to meet these women. He could not believe in them. Women to him meant something gentle and childlike. He had not known many even in America and he had remained celibate under the eyes of Buddha. He was curious now but not afraid, and his only weapons were high boots and a stick against the snakes.

It was not quite midnight. Behind him the village was dead. In his truck each driver lay curled into the seat, pretending sleep. Wang, faithful in all else, had refused to come with him now.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"It is better for a white man to be alone with The Women," he said, and when Tim was gone drew the wooden bar across the door of his room and sat on the food-box. There was little enough in that food-box now. A few tins of soup, one of beans, a can of dried milk and a little sugar — even a truck-driver would not be tempted much. But duty had become habit.

Tim, crouching in that jungle midnight which is so full of evil noise, felt his skin stir and his hairs move. In the moonlight he saw at last people, gathering at the further edge of the bog. He saw a moving darkness broken by wavering and flickering light. He watched until it seemed to him the bog was half full of people. "Bandits," he thought, whether they were men or women, and slowly he grew very angry.

"Hell, my guns are to fight the Japs," he thought, watching them. "I'm simply going to march up to them and tell them. I shall put them on their honour as patriots."

He leaped up and, putting on his flashlight steadily, he struggled across a quarter of a mile of mire.

They saw him. He knew that because suddenly all movement ceased and every light went out. They drew together in a black mass, and he felt them there waiting. But he went on, dragging one leg and then the other out of the sucking black mud.

When he drew near enough to speak he stopped; then he lifted his flashlight. The circle of its light framed a face, a strong, handsome face. It was the face of a woman! He played the light upon one face after another. They were women, all of them.

THE FACE OF BUDDHA

"I'll be damned," he said clearly in English.

There was not a whisper, not a movement in the horde standing solidly together, blocked before him in the moonlight.

"Who are you?" he asked in Chinese.

No one answered. They stood in their silence.

He brought the light back to the one in the front. He studied her face again — granite, smooth, the great eyes black as onyx, comprehending nothing or everything, he could not tell which. And yet he had a curious knowledge of having seen it elsewhere. He turned his light over her huge body. She had no gun, no weapon indeed of any kind, for in her hands was a farm hoe.

"Where do you come from?" he asked. He put the light on her eyes as he did so, but there was not a flicker of response in them, only a vast, determined waiting. And he began in a sort of panic to back away from her. As the light swept across the bodies of the others he saw that each held a hoe or a shovel. He turned and ran floundering through the mud.

When he had reached the shadow of the trees he waited and watched. No one had pursued him, and after a while, as though they waited to make sure he was gone, he saw the mass begin to stir and move, and in the moonlight to scatter, and after a while there were flickering lights again. And then he saw what they were doing. They were working on the road, the road which had felled so many men. They had come for this and for nothing else. He stood watching them, their strong, oxlike figures moving steadily, swiftly. Yes, that was all they had come for, and all they were doing.

TODAY AND FOREVER

He turned away at last and went toward the village. It was not far from dawn when he pounded on the door Wang had barred.

"You are not dead?" Wang inquired when he saw him.

"No," Tim said shortly.

"And the bandits, sir?"

"They will not come here," Tim said, without thinking. He wanted to keep secret, somehow, that which he had seen. It was difficult to explain. But Wang darted under his arm as he leaned in the doorway. A moment later Tim heard him boasting everywhere in the inn.

"What did I say? The Women are not coming. My master forbade it."

He let him boast. What did it matter? He had seen a miracle.

It became known as a miracle, indeed, in that region, as the bog which had swallowed into itself the bodies of so many men grew within a few days to a strong belt of firm land. Stone was thrown into its depths, rocks and boulders crushed and smoothed over stone, and earth beaten into that. Men came back morning after morning to marvel at what the night had done. Or had they, they asked themselves, done more than they knew the day before? Undoubtedly there was a miracle somewhere. It was better not to ask, merely to accept it.

In five days and nights more the road was ready. Tim, at the head of the caravan, drove his truck cautiously, the first to pass. Was the whole thing a dream and a mirage? But the road was firm upon the quaking bog. It was safe. He drove on, and reached the further side, and behind him came hundreds of other trucks and vehicles of every sort, carrying goods into the back door of China.

THE FACE OF BUDDHA

In the temple the boxes stood waiting to be claimed. Tim, bathed and fresh, came in from his bedroom and looked at them. He had not the slightest idea what to do next. At that moment he felt a touch on his arm. He turned and saw the abbot.

"I heard you were back," the abbot said.

"Only just," Tim said.

"You were successful?" the abbot inquired.

"Wholly," Tim replied. "And you — where did you go?"

"I?" the abbot said innocently. "Ah, I remember where I left you. Why, I returned to a region I once knew when I was young, where, in fact, I killed a man because of a woman. She was not my wife, for Buddha willed otherwise. Yet this time Buddha sent me to her again because in that region the people do not fear the tiger sickness. They do not die of it, especially the women."

"Immune at last, are they?" Tim asked. "They must have had centuries of it. I suppose you could call those mosquitoes tigers, at that."

"Buddha protects the people there," the abbot replied, "and I remembered and I went to find her, who in my youth was fearless of man or tiger."

The abbot paused, and went on. "She is a woman," he said, "and only I in all the universe could make her obey Buddha's will."

"A miracle?" Tim asked, smiling.

"Everything is a miracle," the abbot replied, "and this, also. I said to her, 'Our son has need of weapons against our enemy, and a white man has the weapons, But he waits for the road to be ready.' "

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Your son?" Tim repeated.

"Ah," the abbot said quietly.

"In that case," Tim said after a few seconds, "I suppose you can tell him the guns are here."

"They will be gone tomorrow morning when you rise," the abbot said peacefully.

Side by side they gazed out over Tali the beautiful, lying beyond the open door. It was exactly as it had always been for centuries except for that new road lying flat and white beside it. Upon the road were moving shining sparks, weaving back and forth. They were cars and trucks of every sort. Tim watched them as each caught the sun for an instant and went on, between the mountains, east and west.

"It will be quite easy now to get anything in over the new road," Tim said.

"It will, truly," the abbot replied, and having said all he wanted to say, he went away.

So when the abbot was gone and Tim had finished his dinner he sauntered down the mountain once more to the dingy telegraph office and waked the clerk asleep on the table.

"Cable," he said, and printed a few words on a bit of paper.

"Goods delivered," the little clerk read sleepily, scratching his head. "What is your best price for double last order. Rush. Tim."

"Right," Tim said.

He climbed the mountain again and found Wang in a long white robe waiting for him with tea and small sesame cakes. Under that perfection of calmness Tim discerned an enormous excitement but he paid no need to it.

THE FACE OF BUDDHA

"I'm going to bed, Wang," he said cheerfully, "and I shall sleep soundly until morning."

"Yes, sir," Wang said, and added in a quiver of Chinese gratitude, "please, thank you, sir."

His hand was upon the lamp to turn it low. In the last flicker of its glow Tim, turning at his bedroom door, saw the golden face. Surely the golden eyelids lifted and surely the onyx eyes gazed at him, comprehending nothing or everything, he could not tell which.

"Don't thank me for a miracle," he said.

Guerrilla Mother

MADAME CHIEN was fifty years old and full of secrets. To no one in her life had she ever opened this vast store. She had begun its accumulation as soon as she was able to think, which was many years before Japan invaded China. Thought had begun, perhaps, when Madame Chien discovered that she was a girl, and this was when she observed a difference in the love her parents bestowed upon her and that given to her brother. The difference was qualitative. The love her brother received, although he was younger than she, was weighted with deference; that given to her was delightful and indulgent, but full of demands upon her services and without regard to her wishes or to the needs of her mind. She brooded upon this until one day she felt compelled to put a question to her mother. This brought a sharp answer.

"You may as well learn early as late that you are a woman," her mother said, "and that, being a woman, you cannot expect to be treated as a man."

Madame Chien, then a child of nine, made no reply to this. But from then on she began the accumulation of her secrets, storing them behind the impregnable wall of her unusual beauty and great charm. Thus while her brother was tutored in much learning, she sat in the next room, embroidering endlessly, but so near the door that she heard everything. She stole his books so skilfully that he did not miss them or thought them merely misplaced, and from them she learned to read, not only Chinese, but a little English and some Japanese. This was another of her secrets. No one knew she understood any foreign language, and no one really knew how well she read her own, or that she found comfort in repeating to herself pages from the philosophies of the sages, written only for the comfort of men. Indeed, had she gone up for examination instead of her brother she would have passed higher than he. But at seventeen she was married.

GUERRILLA MOTHER

She took with her into her husband's house all her secrets. One was that she had ceased to believe in gods. In a household where women were ignorant and therefore superstitious and devout attendants at temples, all would have been shocked and even terrified had they known that the beautiful calm young girl who spoke little and always gently had quietly put away all belief in gods. She had heard her brother's tutor explain too much science ever to believe in them again. But still she bowed her head decorously before the household gods in her husband's house as she had in her father's, believing not in them but in their usefulness as objects of worship necessary for those ignorant enough to need them.

Still another of her secrets was her profound though kindly contempt for the ignorant and the stupid. She discovered, almost immediately, that her husband was among these, not because he was poor, but because he was too rich, the son and grandson of rich men. This was a deep blow, for she had dreamed of the companionship of an intelligent man.

TODAY AND FOREVER

But she accepted the truth as she found it, and in her husband's presence she was always amiable and smiling, using only so much of her thought as was needful to carry on a conversation as he liked it. The rest of her mind she occupied with much pondering and thinking upon the many books she continued to read in secret.

As years passed she became more and more intelligent and wise, and as her wisdom grew, more beneficent, so that her husband depended upon her for everything, even the direction of his vast inheritance of land and tenants, and certainly her four sons and three daughters learned all they knew from her. Without revealing any of her secrets as they actually were, she instilled into them the love of knowledge so that they sought its sources for themselves. None of them penetrated behind the impregnable wall of her beauty and her charm, which she varied for each so that to her husband she seemed all wife and lover, and each child thought himself her favourite. She was fond of them all but she allowed none to enter behind her wall. There she lived with her secrets, her increasing stores of all sorts of knowledge, her pondering, her imaginations and conclusions about men and women and the universe.

Thus had passed her years. But there had been little of the peace she craved in her life. She was continually employed in the management of the great household and in settling the complaints and troubles it brought to her. Nor had the times into which she was born been peaceful. For she had experienced the threat of revolutions and the warfare between war-lords that comes in times of change, and she had watched power taken from a single sovereign in the empire and bestowed upon many people in the newly made republic, though without hope. "For why," she thought, "should we expect many stupid persons to rule better than one?" So when taxes rose, when evils increased and quarrels were magnified, she was not cast down, being inwardly prepared and fortified from her secret stores.

GUERRILLA MOTHER

There came a day when, bad having already gone to worse, it was evident to all that a foreign enemy had not only attacked the nation, but was winning a steady victory. Madame Chien had watched the advance of the Japanese from its first beginning in the far northern province of Manchuria to its present approach to her own home, which was in a small city near a southern sea-coast. Now she knew that it was her duty to those remaining in her household to remove them to the inner country beyond the reach of the invaders. She made up her own mind on this, and then, as a dutiful wife, she asked her husband what he wished, skilfully revealing by her apparently humble questions what she herself thought best, and expressing her appreciation of his wisdom when a few moments later she said his wishes were her own.

It was when she was undertaking the organization of the huge household for flight that one day the greatest of her secrets took form in her mind. In the midst of confusion, terror, and noise, in the midst of the loud talking of carriers and servants, she thought of how peaceful the house would be when they were all gone, and the house would be empty.

"I have never felt peace," she thought, "I have never heard silence."

The more she imagined this peace and silence, the more she longed to experience it. At last she felt compelled, and she cast about in her mind for ways. Her household was very large by now. Her four sons were all married and had their wives and children under her roof. Two of her daughters had gone to the houses of their husbands, but the youngest was still with her. It was this youngest daughter, she decided, who was the only real responsibility, and this the more because she was also the prettiest. It was for her sake that Madame Chien, after much thinking, called to her side her own faithful old woman-servant the night before they were to leave.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Li Ma," she said, "I have an especial charge to put upon you."

"I will take it, mistress," the sturdy old woman replied.

"It is no more than this — you are to stay always with your little third mistress, my youngest daughter," Madame Chien told her.

"That I will anyhow," Li Ma replied, "for I am always with you, mistress, and on this journey you will keep her with you."

Madame Chien smiled. She had now disposed of her two chief charges, for Li Ma would have insisted on remaining with her and she wanted no one.

"Good night, faithful one," she said.

They were to start when dawn broke. The Japanese by now were none too far away. Madame Chien slept well in the knowledge of her newest secret, waking only a little before dawn. The servants were already busy, and outside the compound wall three motor-cars stood waiting. At the end of the good roads horses would be waiting to take them over the mountains, and from there they would go into inner China and be safe.

GUERRILLA MOTHER

She rose, and Li Ma came in to dress her. Everything was ready and the family party came out of the courtyards, weeping as they came. There was little hope that this house could be again as it had been for five generations of life. All knew that some sort of end was come. Madame Chien was the last of the procession, "so that I may see that all is right," she had told them. She had asked her husband to lead the procession, and so he went into the first car, and with him were the two eldest sons, their wives, and children. Immediately behind him were the two younger sons, their wives and children, and some of the servants. The third car stayed for Madame Chien. In it already were the youngest daughter, Li Ma, and all the young bondmaids. The two cars started, and the driver of the third set his engine going. To this driver Madame Chien had come out an hour ago and said in a low voice when none was near :

"When I cry 'Ready,' and when you hear the door of the car slam, then go as fast as you can, and do not heed any clamouring from my daughter or the women. Do not stop for any cause until you are beyond the city gate."

This would have amazed him had she not first stupefied him with the amount of silver she put into his hand as she spoke. All he could do was to gasp :

"I will obey you, mistress."

He did obey, therefore. He heard her low voice say "Ready." He heard the door slam, and he let the car leap forward. In all the din he heard the screaming of women's voices behind him, but, remembering he was not to hear them, he did not, and the car rushed on to the city gate.

Madame Chien looked after it with quiet triumph.

TODAY AND FOREVER

The city gates had been locked for many days, and they would be opened only a few moments at dawn for those who wished to flee. Then they would be instantly closed and opened for no one. She was safely left behind as she had secretly planned to be.

. . . The stillness about her was so intense that the world seemed to have stopped. She went back into her own gate and barred it that she might be utterly alone. There was no other reason to bar it, for there was no longer anything of value to anyone behind it except to herself. The jewels were in a pigskin box in Li Ma's keeping. The family valuables and the finest of carved blackwood furniture inlaid with Yunnan marble had been sent to the country. All the pretty girls were gone. She had no further responsibility toward anyone or for anything. Day and night there had been those who had the right to make their demands upon her, and, trained to outward submission, she had fulfilled her duties. Now she had no duties. For the first time in her life, as long as she could remember, she was alone, and she had nothing to do. She smiled and sat down on a rock in the shade of a clump of bamboos in the main courtyard.

"I do not need to rise from this rock," she thought. "Not at least until I wish it."

So she continued to sit upon it quietly, enjoying the silence as she had dreamed she would. It was cool even as the sun rose higher. The shadows of the bamboos shrank but she was still within them. She did not even rise when in an hour or so the sound of a siren tore the silence apart to warn the city of approaching enemy planes again, as they did almost every fair day. There was a bomb shelter built under the peony court, but being alone she did not trouble to go to it. "Bombs will not pick out one old woman," she thought peacefully. She thirsted for more and more loneliness. "Besides," she thought, "perhaps death itself is only this empty quiet, but forever." She had never been afraid of death, but now it occurred to her that death might even be pleasant.

GUERRILLA MOTHER

It was at this moment that the explosion occurred. She glanced at the sky and saw a solitary plane shine silver. Something dropped from it like thistle-down, like an egg, then suddenly lightning was above her and thunder roared.

"It is to be death," she thought, and closed her eyes and did not move. .

But it was not quite death. The bomb struck the street outside her barred gate. She heard the clatter and crash of the falling wall. She rose then and went out. The wall was a ruin of dust and broken brick. She looked at it, and then up and down the street. So far as she could see, no one had been passing. It was a quiet street at all times and more than ever during these past days.

Yet even as she watched it, the street ceased to be empty. It began to be filled first with noise, and there was the noise of many feet running. Then around the far corner she saw a horde of men swirling in a mob. In an instant the street was full of these men, all in the uniform of the Chinese army. They swarmed around her and over the ruins of the wall. They passed her without seeing her. Every face was staring ahead, every mind intent on escape from some desperate danger.

"They are retreating," she thought, and she knew that the enemy was at hand.

She had for many days expected the enemy, but she had reasoned that when they came, as of course they would come, they having the better arms, she would live somehow under their rule. So long as she could keep her secrets she could live under any rule, however alien. Besides, an old woman was valuable to no one, and then she marvelled that life was still so sweet to her. Husband and children and duty had ceased to have meaning for her, but there were all her secrets whose meaning she had never had enough time to pursue, nor peace enough.

TODAY AND FOREVER

This peace she now gave up in the instant between one breath and another. While she drew one breath she stood upon her own ground, and when she drew the next she had stepped into the midst of the fleeing men as one steps into a rushing stream. The stream closed about her and carried her onward. There was no escape from it and no turning back. She gasped once or twice.

"I must remember I am not in retreat," she thought, and recovered herself while she felt herself swept on. She laid her hand upon the arm of the man next to her.

"Why are you retreating?" she called into his ear.

He turned a dazed face to her and she saw he could understand nothing because of the panic in which he was engulfed with all the crowd.

"This is very stupid," Madame Chien thought as she ran. Her mother had bound her feet when she was a girl, but Madame Chien had allowed them to be gradually more free as she grew older, and long ago she had outgrown the pain both of their binding and their freeing. It was not therefore her feet which made her gradually slow her pace.

"You are all stupid!" she called loudly, and found a pleasure in saying aloud what she so often thought secretly of men. "You are stupid to run away from those little dwarfs — shame on you, sons of Han ! Shame — shame — shame !"

GUERRILLA MOTHER

And as she thus cried shame, she braced her body back, and in the centre of that foolish rush of fear-crazed men, her body became a fixed and steady point.

"Shame — shame — shame," she chanted, bracing herself against them.

They seemed not to hear her. They seemed to slip about her and past her, leaving her behind. Then she turned so as to face those who still came, and, her back to retreat, she continued her chant of shame.

Imperceptibly they heard her, or perhaps they did not so much hear her as feel her in their midst as a force of some sort strong enough to oppose their flight. Certainly at last some stayed, and then many stopped. They stood packed together in the street about Madame Chien, their faces red and their eyes still wild, and they wiped their faces with torn and dusty sleeves. But in their faces she saw shyness because of the shame she had cried upon them. She saw, too, that they were very young and that they had as weapons only small light guns.

"Where are you going ?" she asked them.

No one answered, and then a young man answered in a rough voice :

"Anywhere for escape ! Why should we stay to be killed ? The enemy has foreign cannon and all our captains gave us were these !" He held up his little gun to show her. She took it and examined it. It was the first time she had ever had a gun in her hand, but among her secrets there was one about modern weapons. She had found in the old shop she frequented, as other women frequent temples, a book in English entitled The Science of Modern Warfare, and there were many pictures in it. She had bought it, since it was then about the time of Japan's seizure of Manchuria.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"But this is a good enough gun," she remarked ; "it is not too old in its fashion, and with it, if you crept close enough to a cannon, too close to be its target, you might kill the man behind it. Long-range cannon," she went on, "are more dangerous at a distance than near."

The men stared at her and the young man began to laugh. "Where did a lady learn this ?" he asked.

Madame Chien looked at him with dignity. "Where is the enemy ?" she inquired.

"They are advancing from the north," the young man replied, "and they are now less than three miles from the city."

"But that means they must cross the river," Madame Chien said.

"They are crossing now," a dozen voices shouted. "They have us in a trap !"

"Oh, you fools," Madame Chien cried, "it is you who have them in a trap. Does not the river circle the city except at the south and can you not circle the river and hold the south open like the neck of a bottle ?"

"But when they cross the river to go on——" a voice began, but Madame Chien interrupted it.

"They will not cross it if they think they hold the city and do not know you are in ambush," she said.

They stared at her and at each other. This was only a woman, their eyes said, but certainly, they reflected behind their eyes, not one like other women.

GUERRILLA MOTHER

"How do you know these things?" the young man asked boldly.

"I have my secrets," Madame Chien replied with her usual calmness. The sun was growing very hot. "We had better keep on moving as we are to the river," she said.

So they began to move again, but now there was no more of the flurry of retreat. They marched steadily as men do who have been given a direction, and Madame Chien walked with them. It was not too hard, for she had never been a slow-moving woman. She had by habit hastened her feet that her tasks might be finished quickly, and her legs were strong and her graceful back was strong. It was an hour before she began to wish for rest. But an hour was long enough. By then they had reached the river and there they met the others, who, still in retreat, were bargaining for boats to cross the river.

"Stop," the young man said to them on every hand. "We have a better plan." He stepped forward and Madame Chien, though she still believed in no gods, thanked the clear heaven above her that among all these fools there had been this young man near her. For he, she now observed, was not a fool.

"Let us seem to retreat," he was saying. "Let us cross the river, and then we will encircle its loop. A fourth of us will go to the bottle-neck at the south and there hide. The others will hide about the river. As we are able we will shoot one and another of the enemy if they pass through the city and make to go onward."

"But what if they stay in the city?" a man objected.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"All the better," Madame Chien murmured behind the young man. "Then how easy to mingle with farmers as they go to market and to mingle with crowds in tea shops, to hear, to learn, to plan for attack——"

"All the better," the young man shouted loudly. "Then we can mingle among the people and we can listen and learn and when the moment comes we can attack."

Madame Chien, watching the listening faces, decided suddenly that these were not all fools. They were bewildered but not cowards.

"Brave men!" she cried suddenly.

They had forgotten her and many of them had never seen her, but now they all looked at her and laughed when they saw a delicate old lady had called so loudly.

"You are brave," they shouted and they spat on their hands and swore by their mothers, and one after the other said in one way or another the same thing. "We will all die one day anyway," they said, "so why not your way?"

And Madame Chien, watching them, thought, "If I leave them now, what will they do? They are strangers in this place."

She had chosen to remain in a city certain of beleaguerment because in the midst of that beleaguerment she might live alone and in peace. Now suddenly she foresaw the end of all peace.

"My wall is still fallen in dust and ruin, though," she thought, "and if I went back now, who would there be in all the confusion of the city able to build it up again?"

Without deciding to stay or return, her attention was now directed to the rapacity of a boatman. All boatmen on river or lake are rapacious, but this man was so harsh in his demands that Madame Chien grew angry.

GUERRILLA MOTHER

"At a time like this," she remarked in her clear voice, "no one should think of himself. Take his boat, you men, and man it yourselves. Take all the boats you need, but see that they are returned, for they are a livelihood, even if there are some who do not deserve to live."

"Seize the boats," the young man cried. "He who thinks of his own profit now is a traitor."

In a moment the soldiers had seized the boats, and, being sons of ordinary men and women, they rowed themselves across very well. The young man waited for the last boat. Then he turned to Madame Chien :

"Come with us, good mother," he said simply.

And as simply she rose from the grass where she had been resting and, putting her hand upon the arm he held out for her, she stepped into the boat and knew as she did so that she left peace behind her.

The attack itself did not take place for many days. Madame Chien did not allow it.

"Let the bottle be filled," she told the young man. By now she knew that his name was Tung Li. "Call me Lih-tse," he said. "Everyone does."

But Madame Chien found herself unable to be so familiar and so she called him by his full name or by nothing.

"When the bottle is filled we will put in the stopper," she continued.

There was a great deal to do before then. The men must be disguised so that they could wander about the city freely and see where the enemy was quartered and how many there were and what were their habits. The moment of attack must depend on knowledge. She lived now in a corner of a farmer's hut, cut off by a reed mat from his teeming family. A bamboo bed, an unpainted table, and a rough stool were its furniture. The bed she used very little. At the table she sat long with Tung Li, plotting every move of every day, and she drew out of her stores one secret after another. Thus she said :

TODAY AND FOREVER

"I read a foreign book once, though translated into our own tongue, concerning war and peace. There was a great battle in it, and this was its progress."

With her long finger-nail she traced in the dust of the table the moves of the campaign Napoleon had once made against Russia. "But first," she said, "we must send a spy into the city who can creep into the very headquarters of the enemy to listen to the plans as they are made. Common soldiers know nothing of what their captains plan for them."

"Alas, we understand nothing of their language," Tung Li said.

Madame Chien reflected upon this for the space of half a moment.

"Ah," she said. "Then I must be the spy."

"Can you?" Tung Li asked. By now he was half frightened of her. He had begun seriously to wonder who this woman was whose face was still so delicately beautiful, and whose garments, though dust-stained, were so fine. Being the son of a peasant mother, he believed in gods and goddesses, in fairies and fox-women, and he was now more than sure that Madame Chien came from among them, sent by Heaven in man's need.

GUERRILLA MOTHER

"I can understand a little Japanese," Madame Chien said shyly, "though it always seemed useless until now."

She was almost frightened herself. Had she all these years been shaped toward a destiny now near?

Thus she became a spy. In coarse clothing borrowed from the farmer's wife, with brown dust from the threshing-floor rubbed into her skin, she took a basket and filled it with the lard cakes the farmer's wife made sometimes to sell, and put it on her arm as a vendor does. The farmer's wife examined her to see that all looked as it should. Madame Chien was an actress, having played for many years the part of a woman always amiable and never too clever for men's comfort. When she had roughened her hair and blackened her teeth, she also put on her face a look of stupidity clever enough to deceive all. Her own children would have passed her as a stranger.

"How nice you look now," the farmer's wife cried. "Exactly like one of us," she continued, and then she saw that the cakes were uncovered. "They will be full of dust," she exclaimed, and she snatched the family towel from a peg in the earthen wall of the hut.

But Madame Chien's gorge rose at the sight of this towel, though she knew unreasonably, for what did it matter what lay over cakes sold to the enemy? Nevertheless her instincts cried out beyond her control. The towel was black and filthy, and she had seen it used to wipe tables and bowls and children's faces and the farmer's sweat, and indeed for every necessity of family life.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"You will need your one towel," she said gracefully. "I can easily buy another at the city gate."

It was this fresh clean cloth that she bought a little later in the bazaar under the arch of the city gate which brought Madame Chien direct into the presence of the captain of the enemy. Thus Heaven arranges for those whom it loves. For though Madame Chien herself did not know it, the Japanese hated filth so much that in spite of hunger they would not eat cakes from under the dirty sweat-filled towels of the vendors. When she came to the tea shop and they saw her basket covered with pure white, they clamoured for her cakes, and she was obliged to raise the price of them lest they be sold before she wished them gone. Even so, this might have happened had not a young soldier pulled her sleeve and motioned to her to follow him.

"Do not buy any more," he commanded his fellows. "The captain will want these."

When she heard this she was frightened again by her seeming destiny. But she did not hesitate. She followed him along a familiar road until he brought her before the fallen wall of her own house. Then she perceived what had happened. Since hers was the best house in the small city, the captain had taken it for his own. She followed the soldier across her own threshold into the courtyard where a few days before she had sat down to rest, dreaming of peace. She followed this stranger into her own house, and there in the main hall sat the captain, at ease in her husband's lounging-chair. With him were his lesser officers.

The young man she had been following saluted.

"What is it?" the captain asked.

GUERRILLA MOTHER

"I found an old woman selling clean cakes, sir," the soldier replied.

"Can it be?" the captain retorted. He wagged his head and laughed and motioned Madame Chien to come near. He lifted the white cloth and seized all the remaining cakes and began to eat them with great greediness. "If you had been a few years younger, old woman," he said with his mouth full, "I might have wanted more of you than cakes." His men, seeing this was a joke, laughed, and the captain was pleased with himself. "Come back tomorrow," he said loudly to Madame Chien. But she kept her stupid look, and so he made motions until she seemed to understand and nodded and then she went away.

Thus day after day she returned to her own house and bit by bit she became a serving-woman there where she had always been mistress. It was easy enough to begin by pouring tea into the bowls that were emptied as her cakes were eaten, and then she lit cigarettes and then she fetched food and then she tidied rooms and dusted their furniture. Her own room she found occupied by three young Japanese women, and she came gradually to wait upon them, and all the time she gave no sign of understanding any word spoken of all those she heard and did understand. She was careful to understand no command shouted at her, but continued to serve quietly as she saw need, as though she did not even know that it was she they commanded, and so at last they forgot her and spoke as though she were not there.

Then she learned everything about them, where their men were quartered and in what numbers, and how the campaigns to the north went and how many men must be sent to help in that campaign, and what ammunition was brought here to be stored and where it was stored.

TODAY AND FOREVER

Everything she knew she carried back at night to Tung Li who waited for her at the farmer's hut. "Let them eat and drink a few days longer, and grow softer and more weak," she advised him when he was impatient for attack. "In a few days half of the men are to be sent north. When that day comes, there will be left in the city only a garrison, but much ammunition where I have told you. We can attack easily, and with the ammunition and the stored cannon and guns we can pursue those marching to the north. Strengthen your men for that day."

So Tung Li obeyed her as he now did in everything. He built his men into a strong band, and they named themselves The Black River Guerrillas, and one night some came to Madame Chien with a request from them all.

"We wish to call you our mother," they said, "because you have brought us good luck."

In their hearts they all now believed her faery, though she did not know it, being always modest. But she was touched by their childlike nature.

"I am proud to call you my sons," she replied.

Thereafter she gave her own response to them by small merciful deeds. She mended rents in their coarse garments with the exquisite skill she had once used in embroidering upon satin birds and butterflies and flowers. If a man were hurt she washed and bound his wounds. Of such things she knew much because she had once bought some large books of foreign medicine. A servant in the house of a foreign physician in another city had stolen them from his master to sell for a little money for himself, and they had drifted from hand to hand until she saw them. It occurred to her now that she should have these books by her, since there might be many wounded men in the days to come, and thereafter each day when she went back to her house she thrust one of these books under her peasant coat.

GUERRILLA MOTHER

"We are now ready to take back the city," Tung Li told her one night. "But how shall we know which is the right and lucky day if you do not set it for us?"

"Two-thirds of the enemy leave on the night of the full moon," she replied. "But whether that or the next day is the day, depends on a secret plan of mine."

"Keep your secrets," he replied hastily, a little afraid of her.

It was as though gods had put that word into his mouth.

"I will," she said calmly, not dreaming of his fear.

This secret was that she remembered where her husband kept his foreign wines. These wines he loved, but they spoiled easily until she devised a way to store them in an old well near his private courtyard. She had had a ladder hung against the side of this well and shelves built around its old brick walls and a thick cover made for its mouth.

"Foreigners put their wines in caverns under their houses," she had told him, for so she had once chanced to read, "but since our houses are built upon flat ground this is better."

Now in a moment left free she went to that well. Vines had grown over the cover and she could not lift it alone. But it meant also that none had discovered the place. So she went back and herself found the captain and pulled his sleeve and made motions that he was to come with her. He humoured her now as they all did, and so he came. When she pointed to the old well he thought it was treasure and shouted for his aide to come and open it. That one put his shoulder to the cover and twisted it up against the vines and then the strong summer sunshine fell upon the dusty bottles.

TODAY AND FOREVER

The captain gave a roar of joy. "I thought it was only gold!" he cried. He reached his arm down and pulled up a bottle and cracked the head off on the stone curb and poured the foreign wine down his throat.

Madame Chien watched him. The men she had known, her father, her brother, her husband, her sons, drank this wine in sparing small porcelain bowls at meal-times, but this man drank it down in gulps. She slipped away while he still tilted the bottle at his mouth. She crossed the courtyards and the fallen wall and hastened back to Tung Li, stopping only to bribe the watchman at the city gate.

"Prepare," she told Tung Li. "Tonight is the hour."

When he had hastened away she felt suddenly overcome with weariness. After all, she had never been a serving-woman before, and busy though her life had been, it had been to command servants and not to serve. "After the enemy is driven from this city, my work will be done," she thought.

Time after time in that furious night she promised herself peace when it was over. The guerrillas crossed the river in the moonless dark. She sat in the boat with Tung Li and she directed the men to the southern gate where the bribed watchman let them through, though his face was pallid when he did it, and when they were gone he leaped into his bed and pretended a sleep as sound as death. And Madame Chien led them to every secret place where the enemy was quartered. All that the men had not found out for themselves she knew, and at every place the men were stationed to wait for the attack. But Tung Li and his strongest men she led to her own house.

GUERRILLA MOTHER

"Here is their captain," she said. And then to her own surprise her long loathing and disgust rose in her and cried out. She had so grown to hate that man, his brutal looks and ways, his coarse shouts and sudden rages, that she had even come to pity the three women in her room because his lusts toward them were so vicious.

"Kill the captain first," she said.

"I will," Tung Li said.

"I shall wait beyond that gate," she said, pointing to a court.

"There I will bring you the news of victory," he promised her.

And she, while the attack was carried out in her house and in every house where the enemy was, went back to her courtyard and found that cool old rock and sat down upon it and waited for peace. When all this was over and the dead cleaned away she would go on with being alone. Loneliness in her house would be sweeter than ever. She sat waiting for it while the guns cracked in the darkness and men, surprised in sleep and drunkenness, swarmed and groaned and gave great sighing gusts of breath before they died. She sat in the darkness listening.

"Of all my secrets, when peace comes, this will be the strangest," she thought.

TODAY AND FOREVER

Quiet fell with dawn. Through the pale new light she saw Tung Li come wearily through the gate.

"They are dead," he said. "How they bleed!"

She did not answer this. She waited a moment and then rose.

"I will return to my own house," she said. She had told none of them from where she had come nor that this was it.

But before she could take a step Tung Li cried out at her, "Are you not going with us against the others?"

"What others?" she said as stupidly as if she had been anybody.

"The men who were sent against the cities to the north," he said.

And then to her amazement he dropped on his knees and knocked his head before her as men do before images in temples. "Do not leave us now," he said. "We must make greater battle than this if we are to drive out the enemy. What is a little town if they hold our great cities and our sea-coasts and our northern provinces, and how can we prevail if you do not tell us the will of heaven?"

Then for the first time she understood that he thought her more than human and so he wanted her aid. She was about to deny her divinity and then she did not. He was a simple fellow and the simple, she thought with sad wisdom, must be given their gods. What did it matter if it were she or another?

She stood wavering. How lovely in her courts were loneliness and peace! And did she not deserve them now and would it not be her only heaven, since she believed in no other?

And then suddenly loneliness was gone again and peace was scattered to nothing and heaven lost. Through the gate came a score or two of men who had been wounded. But they were gay with victory in spite of pain and bleeding. Their proud talk and laughter rent the last echoes of peace to shreds.

GUERRILLA MOTHER

"I held a door against ten," one boasted, "and then a son of a Japanese turtle thrust his sword through a crack and gave me this."

"And I held two against a wall and killed them both," another said.

She had nothing with which to bind their wounds. "I will go and find some clean water and clean cloth somewhere," she said. They were so used to her doing what she would that they rested themselves and waited. And she went to her own room, passing without a look on the way the bodies of those dead. Her room was empty. The women had fled, for none of their things even were left behind. Yes, there was a clean robe, white cotton cloth with blue flowers, newly washed and hung to dry and so forgotten. She felt it, and now it was dry.

"It will do for their wounds," she thought. She stood for a moment in her room and sighed and took the garment and went back to the noisy court, stopping only to lift a wooden pail of water from a shallow well on the way.

"The enemy left you this to bind your wounds," she told the men. Her quick hands tore the robe to strips. Then she smiled and said playfully, "Good enemy, we must pursue you to thank you for this and all."

They laughed, and even those in pain were comforted, and Tung Li said, "It is you we thank."

None who thought they knew Madame Chien best ever saw her again or heard of her. The war went on so long that once her eldest son came back to search for her and to ask if any had seen or heard of his mother. But none had. He wandered through the empty house and saw no sign that she had been there after them. She must have been killed by the enemy, everyone said, staring into the house. He went away again, back to his father, and they all mourned for her as dead, wearing the white robes for twice the days they needed because she had been so dear to them, to each in his own way.

TODAY AND FOREVER

She herself forgot who she was. The war went on, and it seemed to her at last that all her life she had been nothing but what these young men called her, Guerrilla Mother. The soldiers were rough men and simple, and always too filthy for her wishes. Their torn garments she never could keep mended as she liked, and she must praise and scold and command and punish them by her displeasure when they did not do the right and be ready to comfort them when they died. But she stayed with them. She must lead and follow them, she knew now, until the war was over and peace come, or else until she made her own peace, after all, in a small bit of earth somewhere along the way.

A Man's Foes

MARTIN LIU was bewildered as he stepped out of the train at the railroad station in Peking. Nothing was changed, it was exactly as he had remembered it for the seven years he had been abroad. But he had so long looked forward to this moment of homecoming that now it was come it was unreal.

He stood looking about him, and at that instant saw Wang Ting, his father's chief secretary, and his own sister Siu-li. They were looking in the crowd for him and he now saw them first. He shouted and Siu-li saw him and waved a gay pink handkerchief. She came toward him eagerly, the elderly secretary following her. Martin had not seen this twin sister of his all these years. He had thought of her much, and though he had seen many pictures of her he was not quite prepared for this extremely pretty and poised young woman who put out her hand.

"Elder Brother!" she cried in a soft voice. He was older than she by two hours.

"Is this you, Siu-li?" he inquired, unbelieving.

"It is no other, certainly," she replied, smiling.

"But here's Wang Ting, too."

Wang Ting came bowing and Martin bowed. He remembered with affection this man who had stood as his father's deputy as long as he could remember. That Wang Ting was here now meant that his father was not. He was disappointed, though he had known his father might not come to meet him. Still, after seven years, and he an only son——

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Is Father well?" he asked Siu-li.

He noticed the smallest of hesitations before she answered.

"Yes, he is well. Today it happens he has important business or he would have come."

Wang Ting cleared his throat. "Your father sent every message of welcome by me," he said solemnly. "And he says he hopes you will not delay. There are guests invited for a feast at seven, and it is now nearly half-past five. You will want to rest and he will want a few moments at least with you alone."

Wang Ting stepped back, having done his duty.

"Thank you," Martin said courteously.

"Let's go home quickly," Siu-li said with an unexpected petulance. "Wang Ting, you see to his bags and trunks. We will go on."

Wang Ting bowed and took the checks that Martin handed to him. A few minutes later the brother and sister were sitting side by side in their father's car.

They said nothing for a short while. Each was shy of the other, now that they were alone. Though they were fully aware of their relation, still it remained true that they were a young man and a young woman, strange to each other. Then Martin forgot himself.

"I don't remember this road," he remarked. "I thought we used to go to the right."

"We always did until the Japanese came," Siu-li said. "Now we go this way so as to avoid their chief barracks."

A MAN'S FOES

"I see," Martin said. He knew that the Japanese had full possession of Peking. Even if his father and sister had not written him of it he would have known it from reading the newspapers in New York, where he had been a student. At first he had expected every letter to tell him that his family had moved away, but as time went on and this did not happen he began to believe that things had not changed so much as he had feared they would. Evidently it was still possible for proud Chinese like his father to live under a Japanese flag, although of course it would be only temporary. It was unthinkable that the Japanese would continue to rule in China. That was why he had come back to China with only a Master's degree. His father had urged, indeed had commanded him to remain abroad for two more years at least and if possible longer in order to get practical experience in his chosen field of metallurgy.

"China needs men of the highest training," his father had written.

But Martin, reading in the American newspapers about the way Japanese soldiers were behaving in his country, could not keep his blood calm enough to sit studying.

"I must come back and do what I can now against the enemy," he wrote his father. And without waiting for reply he had drawn his next term's expense money out of the bank and bought a ticket for China. He had expected questions and even trouble at the port; but when he had given his father's name there had been no trouble and the questions had ceased.

"Do the Japanese annoy you on the street?" he asked his sister now.

Again there was that faint but unmistakable

TODAY AND FOREVER

hesitation in her answer. Then she said :

" Sometimes — no, not if they know who I am." Her face shadowed. " But I hate them ! " she said in a low voice. " I want to avoid them ! "

" Of course," he agreed. He was glad to avoid them, too, and he said nothing when the chauffeur drove slowly through small winding alleys instead of the wide main streets of the city.

When the car drew up finally before the gate of his father's home, his throat tightened. He was really home at last !

" It looks just the same," he said, gazing at it.

It was just the same, the wide wooden gates painted vermilion red and set in the thick brick wall and over the wall the old twin pomegranate trees of the entrance court.

" How the trees have grown ! " he said.

" Seven years," Siu-li said, smiling. " I've grown, too, and so have you."

" Yes," he said.

Then he saw something was changed after all. Instead of the one watchman he had been used to see at his father's gate, he now saw two soldiers, uniformed, their bayonets fixed. They presented arms smartly as he stepped from the car and he was embarrassed.

" What's this ? " he whispered to Siu-li when he had returned their salute.

" Father has to have a bodyguard just now," she said in a voice whose quality confounded him. It was angry with scorn.

But she led the way quickly into the gate and there was no time for questions. The first courtyard was full of eager servants, waiting to welcome home the son of the house. Firecrackers exploded and banners waved. He had to speak to all the old ones and to acknowledge the bows of the new. Even his old wet-nurse was there, come in from the country for this day. His mother had died at the birth of the twins, and while Siu-li had her own nurse, Ling Ma had fed Martin and taken care of him when he was too big to suckle. Everyone had expected his father to take another wife but he had never done so.

A MAN'S FOES

"But where is Father?" he asked his sister when it was over at last.

"He seems not to have come home yet," she replied. She hesitated, then went on. "Why don't you go to your room and change your things? By then surely he will be back."

"I will," he replied.

They stood a moment, he feeling that she was about to speak of something. But she did not. She touched his hand merely.

"It is very good to have you home again," she said and left him.

His own room was not changed at all. Its wide paper-latticed window looked out into his own small courtyard. The bamboos, the pine, were the same. Bamboos attained their growth in a single year and seven years were nothing to the pine, already two centuries old.

"Japan and China," he thought, and was pleased with his comparison.

The door opened and Ling Ma came, her face all loving solicitude.

"Now, heart of my flesh, you are not to touch anything. I will unpack your garments and fold them away."

"Foreign suits must be hung, not folded, Ling Ma," he said.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Then show me one and I will do the others," she said. "You must rest yourself, you must eat and sleep and play after all these years of study. You are too thin." She came close and searched his face. "You didn't take a foreign wife?"

Martin laughed at her. "No, no wife!"

She nodded her satisfaction. "Then we must see to it. I will talk with your father myself."

Martin sat down in his foreign easy-chair. "I haven't seen my father yet," he said.

"Oh, he's busy — very busy——" Ling Ma said. She had her face deep in one of his trunks. He could only see her stout back.

"I never knew my father to be busy," he remarked. He could say things to Ling Ma that he could say to no one else.

"He's very busy now," Ling Ma's voice came out of the trunk.

A sudden thought struck him. He put it away and then returned to it. After all, it was only Ling Ma.

"He's not getting married again, is he?" The thought was repulsive, but his father was only fifty years old and it was possible.

"Don't ask me!" Ling Ma's voice was suddenly snappish. She came out of the trunk and her face was very red from bending so long. "Don't ask me anything, Young Master! I don't know anything. If anybody asks me anything about this house, I don't know. I live in the country now with my son and I only came back to welcome you home, heart of my body."

He was used to outbursts from Ling Ma, for she was a woman of impetuous temper. Now he hardly knew whether there was truth in his suspicion or whether she was angry because she had been treated in some way she considered unfair. Ling Ma had quarrelled often over his father's decrees during his childhood, and it might be her old jealousy against authority over the child in her care.

A MAN'S FOES

"Did my father treat you unjustly?" he inquired.

She laughed loudly. "Me, little heart? No, I left this house of my own accord. He even invited me to stay and await your coming. But no, I would not. No, it was nothing he did to me!"

Ling Ma pursed her lips and looked solemn. He was about to put another question to her. Then he decided against it. He did not wish to resume with Ling Ma the old affectionate childish relationship that gave her power over him. He was a man, now. So he said a little coldly:

"That is well, for if he had not given you your due, I should have felt I ought to make amends."

She felt the difference in him and gave way to it at once. "From you I expect only what is good," she said, and then spoke no more, but crept about with her silent solid tread, putting his things right. Then she went away and he was alone.

The house was very still. He had not in years heard such stillness. New York was full of noise, and in its own way, so was the ocean. But this was the stillness of centuries. He felt it around him a protection of strength. What could the enemy do against a great, silent old country?

"They are like swallows attacking a snow-capped mountain," he thought proudly.

At that moment to his astonishment the door opened abruptly and his father came in.

"Father!" he cried with joy.

"My son!" his father replied. He came forward and seized Martin's two hands and held them closely and gazed into his face.

TODAY AND FOREVER

And Martin, receiving that earnest, questioning gaze, felt suddenly shy. Why had his father done so strange a thing as to come to him in his own room? It was not like the austere man he remembered so to step aside from custom. He had been prepared to go to his father when summoned, to stand while his father sat, to answer when he was questioned. But instead here his father was, an eager, even importunate look upon his ageing face. He had aged very much. Martin drew back. Instantly his father loosed his hands and the look disappeared.

"Are you well?" he inquired.

"Quite well," Martin replied. He hurried on, anxious for talk. "I hope you are not angry that I disobeyed you, my father. I felt I must come home now — for two reasons. The first is that I want to be of what use I can against the enemy. The second is that I was honestly ashamed to be living abroad in ease and at study as though my country were not suffering."

His father stood looking at him. "I am not angry," he said. "It would be of little use if I were. This generation does what it pleases."

"No, Father, don't speak so," Martin cried. "It makes me feel you are angry!"

His father shook his head. "No, only certain of your misunderstanding," he said in a low voice.

"Father, how can you say that?" Martin demanded. "I am your son!"

But his father only gave him a melancholy smile. "We will see," he said gently. "Meanwhile, it is time for our guests." He glanced at his son's clothing. "What are you wearing?" he inquired.

A MAN'S FOES

"What do you wish?" Martin asked, surprised. He had imagined a dinner of old friends, informal and gay, and he had thought with pleasure of a soft silk robe, easy and cool, and which he had not been able to wear for a long time.

"Wear your formal foreign evening clothes," his father said. "And what badges have you? Put on the gold key they gave you, and any other thing you have."

He met his son's stare of astonishment. "I want to be proud of you before my — my friends," he said, and then looked at his watch. "It's late," he muttered and hurried away.

In his room alone Martin dressed himself carefully in his best, stiff shirt, silk vest, tailed coat. He had not worn them since the formal college banquet of his graduation day. He had thought then that he would never wear them again — certainly not in his father's home. More mystified than ever, he put on his Phi Beta Kappa key, and his gold signet ring, and his diamond-studded fraternity pins, one Greek letter and the other the honour society of his profession.

"I have nothing more," he thought. Then he remembered a small pin Siu-li had sent him once in play. It had been attached to the first page of a letter. It was made of silver and enamelled in the design of the Chinese flag. Half in fun he took it from the box with his cuff-links and pinned it to his lapel.

"Why not?" he thought. "I'm a good Chinese and I'll let the world know it."

He went out of his room, whistling an American tune under his breath. There was no one about, and he sauntered in the direction of the main hall.

TODAY AND FOREVER

Then he heard voices and he hurried his steps slightly. It was half an hour beyond seven but he had not expected anyone before eight. If he knew his China no one came on time to a dinner. The noise now was that of many voices. It sounded as though everyone had come.

He drew aside the red satin curtain hanging in the door and looked. The room was large, but there were many there, between thirty and forty, his eye guessed. And then he saw something else. He could not believe it, but it was true. Three-fourths of the guests were Japanese! Then his father saw him.

"Come in, my son," he said.

There was nothing for him to do except to obey.

"You should have warned me," he said to Siu-li.

He had come straight to her room after the interminable dinner was over.

"What do I know to tell you?" she retorted.

The years they had been parted were vanished. His anger and dismay had demanded frankness between them, and she had expected him. When he went to her court the light was shining like moonbeams through the opaqueness of the rice-paper lattice, and he saw the shadow of her head bent over a book.

"You should have told me what people are saying," he replied.

"What are people saying except what they, too, do not know?" she retorted again.

"At least you should have told me that my father has Japanese friends," he said.

"But he has always had friends among foreigners in Peking," she said stubbornly. "And some have always been Japanese. The Baron Muraki has been his lifelong friend and you know it."

A MAN'S FOES

Yes, he knew it. When he was a little boy Baron Muraki, even then a kindly, ageing man, used to bring him miniature rickshas and animals and tiny fish of gold-washed silver. Nevertheless he said, "No one can have Japanese friends now."

"I have told Father that, too," Siu-li said quietly.

"What did he say?" Martin demanded.

"That he had seen too many wars to allow them to change his friendships," she replied.

They looked at each other with the tragic and absolute despair of the young.

"It is such men who will lose our country for us," Martin cried, "and I shall tell him so!"

"You will tell Father that?" she cried.

"I'm not afraid of him, any more, not after tonight," he told her. "If you could have seen him, Siu-li, bowing to those strutting little men, the gold on their uniforms like scabs! And calling them carefully by their titles, General This and General That! And pressing the best of everything on them and watching them grow drunk as though they were doing him a favour. I could scarcely swallow, though I've been thinking for years of eating sharks' fins again and spit-roasted duck!" His young face gloomed at her, and she cried:

"Ah, it is hateful, but how can you say anything to Father?"

"I can," he retorted. "These are not the times of Confucius."

He strode away on this strength to his father's court. But it was now very late. The rooms were dark around the large silent court where his father lived so much alone. He hesitated and knew he dared not knock in spite of his angry courage.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"I will wait until tomorrow," he thought, and tiptoed away. It would be all the better to wait, he told himself, back in his own room. He could speak calmly and reasonably in the morning. After all, his father was an old man and it was possible that he did not know what he was doing. It was hard to imagine that the keen eyes of his father did not see all that went on before them, but the time must come for him to fail as for all men. He sighed, tried to sleep, and could not until it was nearly dawn. Then he slept long and extravagantly, and it was noon when he was wakened by Wang Ting, standing by his bed.

"Your father commands your presence," Wang Ting said.

And out of old habit Martin leaped to his feet.

What he must remember, he told himself an hour later, in his father's study, was that old bonds were broken between a man and his son. What the revolution had begun this war had finished. Everywhere young men and women were telling their parents that their country must come first. "Patriotism is higher than filial duty," they were telling old people who felt themselves deserted.

He struggled against the bonds still strong between himself and this tall, slender, silk-robed man. It was hard to believe so dignified a gentleman had been the one he had watched last night. When Martin thought of this his will hardened. His father had been that man, nevertheless.

"Sit down, my son," his father told him.

He sat down, not cornerwise as he had been taught to sit in an elder's presence but as one man sits in the presence of another. If his father noticed this, he made no sign of it.

A MAN'S FOES

"There are many things between us for talk," his father said. "And yesterday I was busy."

"Your time is no longer your own," Martin said boldly.

His father threw him a sharp look. "It is true I am busy," he said smoothly. Something crept over his face like a veil, leaving it expressionless. Against it Martin suddenly rebelled. The last seven years had been spent among frank and impulsive foreigners, and he would not return to careful speech.

"I shall speak plainly," he told his father. "I was surprised to see our enemies in this house."

"Baron Muraki——" his father began.

But Martin interrupted him. "The Baron was only one of nearly a score."

The look on his father's face grew closer.

"Do you accuse me?" he asked gently.

"I do," Martin said. His eyes were steady upon his father's face. But his father's eyes did not turn either.

"Does it occur to you that I may have my reasons?" he asked.

"There can be no reason, now," Martin declared. Small things he had forgotten were coming back to him. In New York a Chinese classmate had suddenly declined further friendship with him. When Martin pressed him one day with an invitation the young man had said curtly, before he turned away:

"My father does not know your father."

It had seemed foolish then to give as cause against friendship that a Chinese merchant in New York had not known a Chinese gentleman in Peking.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"That can scarcely be expected," Martin had said haughtily and thereafter had ignored the man. Now he understood.

And Ling Ma last night — now he understood her hints.

"Do you know, Father, what people are saying about you?" he demanded.

"I have never known what they say, because I have not cared," his father said calmly.

"You must care now — they are saying you are a friend of the Japanese." He watched his father's face. It did not change.

"I have always had my friends among the Japanese," he said.

"They are saying you are a traitor." Martin rose to his feet.

His father's face did not quiver. "Do you believe them?" he asked.

Martin saw curiosity in his look — nothing else. He was suddenly full of angry certainty. Nobody, he thought, had ever known his father well. He had come and gone in this house, a cold and dignified figure whom they had all feared.

"I do not know what to believe," he said.

There was a long pause, then his father spoke :

"You will believe what you want to believe," he said. "That is the habit of the young."

"And is that all you will say?" Martin demanded.

"That is all," his father replied.

They were both very angry, and Martin was the more angry because he was less able to control himself than his father.

"I cannot stay in a house where enemies are accepted as friends," he said proudly.

"Do you mean my house?" his father inquired.

A MAN'S FOES

His blandness drove Martin to his last step.

"Yes," he said.

He rushed from the room. He had exiled himself the day after he had come home. Where now could he go? Siu-li must know. She must help him. He went to find her. She was in her courtyard sprinkling small grey orchids in the rocks, her fingers dipping in and out of a pewter bowl she held.

"I have told Father I cannot stay," he said to her.

She turned, and the bowl dropped from her hand.

"You have quarrelled with him!"

"Yes — forever," he said. "And you must come, too, Siu-li. Only traitors can live in this house. You must come!" he insisted when he saw her face. "I can't leave you if Japanese men are to be allowed to come and go here. But where shall we go?"

She stooped and picked up the bowl.

"I have it already long planned," she said softly. She glanced about the small courtyard. "Twice — I didn't know whether I could stay. There is an old general — did you see him last night? The one with the small white moustache?"

"Yes," he said, and his gorge rose.

"Well, that one — once he saw me, and he asked for me to be brought in." Disgust was dark upon her face.

"Did Father send for you?" Martin cried.

"Yes — I didn't know why, or I would not have gone. When I entered the main hall the old general was there."

"But — but — what did Father say?" Martin was bewildered. This was not like his father!

"He said he thought modern young women could take care of themselves," Siu-li said. A slight pink rose in her cheeks and she went on. "The truth is we had quarrelled the day before, Father and I. He did not want me to go to a dance at the Grand Hotel. I wanted to go and I went. So perhaps he was punishing me."

TODAY AND FOREVER

"It was not suitable punishment," Martin cried. They stood full of a mutual anger.

"We must go," he repeated.

"It could be to the north-west," she said. "I have a friend who knows the way — a girl — soldier."

"Communist?" he asked.

"Guerrilla," she amended.

"Where?"

"I can send her a message for tonight. She comes and goes," Siu-li replied. "She is here now in the city. When she goes back we can go with her. She has ways."

He thought hard for a moment. Into the north-west! It was the birthplace of bandits and war-lords in the old days, the stronghold of communists in the new. He had seen men from the north-west, camel-drivers and travelling merchants, soldiers and wandering priests. They spoke with a burr upon their tongues that was foreign to him and they were more foreign to him than the Americans among whom he had lived. And he was loath to leave this home to which he had looked with longing all his years away from it. Life in Peking was easy and beautiful.

"But not now," he thought; and aloud he said, "It may as well be there as anywhere."

Siu-li wavered one moment before she spoke, but only one.

"I also," she said firmly. She looked down and saw the pewter bowl in her hand and in a gesture of recklessness she lifted it up and threw it over the wall.

A MAN'S FOES

He was forever after to divide his life into two parts, that before he knew Meng-an, and all that which came to him afterwards. The question which he put to himself often was why he did not at once see her for what she was. But he did not. On the day on which he and Siu-li left their home with her, he saw his sister's friend as a small inconspicuous creature, so like a young boy in her peasant garb that it took faith to believe her a girl. He had seen plenty of girls in America, athletic girls, boyish girls, strong-bodied and clear-eyed girls. But one always knew they were girls. Meng-an was without sex, he thought, looking at her again and again, even that first day.

"Though why did I look at her so often?" he inquired of memory.

She was not beautiful. An earnest face, a square, an unchanging mouth with small full lips, eyes very black and white, short shining black hair, skin as brown as a peasant's, and a slim breastless body, carried like the soldier she was, though she wore no uniform now. He said for days of hard journeying, always westward, that there was no allure in this little creature. She seldom talked, and when she did she seemed purposely brusque and plain. But though she was small, she was merciless in her strength. She could walk endlessly and ride anything of a beast. Once she leaped astride a farmer's ox as it pulled a wooden cart. And she had refused the motor-car Siu-li had suggested bringing the day they started.

"Why trouble ourselves with a machine we can use only for a few miles ? ” she said scornfully.

TODAY AND FOREVER

He did not at that moment realize all that her words meant. They had left home quite openly one clear summer's day. Each carried a knapsack and no more. Their father never rose until noon, and Wang Ting meeting them at the gate smiled and bowed and said, as he hurried on :

“ You have a lucky day for your holiday.”

They had looked at each other and smiled behind his back.

“ A long holiday,” Martin had said.

They had not walked more than half a day before Siu-li was exhausted. The sun grew hot. Meng-an, springing along, her cloth shoes silent in the dust, was merciful.

“ You will be able to walk more tomorrow,” she said.

She kept watching for a vehicle and in a little while she stopped a farmer returning from market with his wheelbarrow empty and asked for a ride. He was willing enough, but when Meng-an bade Siu-li to seat herself he was less willing.

“ I thought it was to be you, girl soldier,” he complained.

“ It is the same — she is my friend,” Meng-an replied calmly, and so the farmer pushed Siu-li as far as he was going.

“ Why was he willing for you ? ” Martin inquired, curious to know this small creature's power.

“ He knows we work for them,” Meng-an answered vaguely. “ And I pass here often.”

Everywhere it was the same. With an assurance that might have been impudent in another, Meng-an asked and was given. Village bakers gave her bread, at tea shops she was given a pot of tea, and anywhere a small travelling restaurant-keeper stirred up a bowl of noodles and vegetable oil and shook his head when she held out the cash.

A MAN'S FOES

"We all work for the country," he would say, a little pompously.

They depended on Meng-an for everything and the more as they came into the north-west where she knew all and they knew nothing. By now Siu-li wore man's clothing that she might walk more freely, and Martin wore peasant's garments, and Meng-an wore the ragged boy's clothing that she always put on when she entered land held by the enemy. They walked until noon, ate, slept by the roadside, and walked again until midnight. This they did day after day until it became the habit of their lives. Every other thing they had once done now grew dreamlike in their memories.

"I wonder if Father minds that we are gone?" Siu-li said one day as they rested for a moment.

"He knows why we went," Martin replied.

Meng-an's eyes were upon the bare and distant hills.

"I have not seen my parents for six years," she said suddenly.

"Do you long for them?" Siu-li asked.

"Sometimes," Meng-an said. "Then I remember that if I return to them I return to all the old life — marriage to a man I do not know, a courtyard with the gates locked. And then I get up and go on."

She had never said so much. There was a flicker in her eyes as she spoke but no more. But Martin thought to himself that this small creature had felt things that he did not know.

"Were you early betrothed?" he asked.

TODAY AND FOREVER

She nodded, but did not speak, and he could not for decency ask again.

All these days they had been walking through enemy-held country. Had they been without Meng-an they would have been stopped before this by enemy soldiers. But Meng-an knew how to come and go as a mouse does in a crowded house. Everywhere she was told by someone, a beggar, a farmer, a priest, if there were enemy soldiers near, and then she led them differently, by secret devious ways of her own. Never once did they meet the enemy face to face.

"Though sometimes I do," she told them.

"What then?" Martin asked. He watched her while she answered. Upon that small inscrutable face he was beginning to discern changes, slight to an unseeing eye but vivid to him. This girl could feel.

"I always pretend to be a fool," she said. "Like this——"

By some trick she threw her lower jaw crooked and crossed her eyes and looked an idiot. She straightened herself again.

"Then they let me pass."

"I should think so," Siu-li said, laughing.

But Martin said nothing. At this moment he was not sure whether a girl should be like this Meng-an. There she sat, on a side of the dusty road where they had stopped for a rest. Her hair was brown with dust, and dust lay in shadows on her face.

"She is not beautiful," he thought, "though brave."

And then that night they passed out of enemy-held country and into their own. He could feel the difference, or thought he could, even in the twilight air. Certainly people were more free in their talk and their laughter at the inn where they lodged, and there was much boasting of how this one and that had crept in and out of the enemy line. But Meng-an was the most changed of all. When they reached the inn she went into one room a while. A little later she came out for the evening meal. Martin had washed himself and changed his garments. But he was not prepared for what he now saw. A slim young soldier came out of the room Siu-li and Meng-an shared, a soldier in a clean khaki uniform, belted and buttoned and with a small pistol at the waist. It was Meng-an. When she saw him she saluted and gave him the smallest of smiles. It was the first she had ever given him.

A MAN'S FOES

"You must go to our general," Meng-an told him. Three days more had brought them to the stronghold of this Chinese army to which she belonged. For three days they had walked among a tranquil people, tilling and working the land as though war were in another world. Night brought them to the camp itself, where he would go to the men's division and Siu-li and Meng-an to the women's. They halted at the gate of the temple compound where guards stood. Once inside they must part. Thus Meng-an had paused to speak.

"I will see him tonight," she went on, "and when I have given him my secret messages from the old city, I will tell him of you. He will be glad, for he needs men like you."

Now Martin did not want to part from her.

"When shall we see each other?" he said boldly.

The flicker in her eyes he could discern but not its meaning. Was it feeling for him or against him? He did not know.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"There are many meetings for us all," she said, and whether it was promise or evasion he still did not know. And she gave him no time to think. She led the way inside the gate and they were parted. He was given food and a bed and by dark he slept as all slept, because light at night meant oil and oil was money, and money must be spent on bullets for the enemy.

At dawn he rose, called by a bugle, and after food Martin was summoned by a young man so carelessly clothed as a soldier that on the upper part of him he wore a farmer's coat.

"Are you the son of Liu Ming Chen?" he inquired abruptly of Martin.

"How do you know my father's name?" Martin asked.

"We all know it," the man replied.

Martin was silenced by fear. Why should all here know the name of his quiet scholar father in Peking except now as a traitor? He said nothing.

"The general calls you," the man said. "Follow me."

Without hesitation Martin followed and found himself in the doorway of the cave house where the general lived at the back of the temple as many did here, among these high barren mountains. But this room was comfortable with furniture and the floor was rock swept clean. The general was not a fat old man but a young thin-bodied man in faded uniform. No one could have said he was anything more than another, except agile and clever, relentless if he were an enemy.

"One tells me you know metals," he said to Martin without greeting.

That one, Martin knew, was Meng-an. He wondered jealously if she knew this man well and if they were friends. He had missed her already, for when he woke he wondered if today he would see her and how and when.

A MAN'S FOES

"It is true," he replied.

The young general looked at him shrewdly.

"You left your father," he said.

"Yes," Martin said. The man knew that!

"Many leave their parents these days," the general said gravely. "Once when I was a child I was sent to a Christian school. In their sacred book I found one day by chance words like this: 'And a man's foes shall be they of his own household.' I who had been taught the doctrine of Wu Wei, I thought, 'How evil are these Christians not to know filial duty!' But the days are come." He paused a second. "I, too, left my parents. We must seek a new foundation for the state, lest we be lost."

The general's accent was not that of a peasant.

"Did you go abroad?" Martin asked.

"Yes — who told you?" the general replied.

"No one — but where?" Martin asked again.

"To Harvard and to Leipzig," the general said.

"And you are here," Martin said. It was wonder enough.

"I would be nowhere else," the general said. He hesitated a moment, and then went on. "Out of these inner regions will come those who will take back the land."

"But do these people know they are being attacked?" Martin asked. "They are so calm and they work in their fields as they always have."

"By day," the general broke in. "By night they put down their hoes and take their guns. But by what good luck you came I cannot say. We lack iron, and there is ore in these hills. The rocks shine when they are split. Is that iron? If it is, I will set about mining it out. It may be silver — and it is not so quickly useful. Do you see your task?"

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Yes," Martin said. He was looking at the seamed side of the cave as he answered. In the rocks was his task. He must find iron to make bullets for the enemy.

"Have you any message for your father?" the general asked abruptly. "Meng-an will start for Peking tonight."

"She goes back?" Martin cried.

"It is her work — to slip between the enemy armies and find out everything and bring me word."

"She told you of my father," Martin said.

The general nodded.

"No, I have no message for him," Martin said.

The general nodded again. "Then you may go," he told him.

He did not see Meng-an again. When he reached his tent six men were waiting. When they saw him they saluted.

"We are to go with you into the hills," they said.

By some means they had with them the few tools he needed — pickaxes, baskets for rock fragments, materials for mapping, and rolls of bedding.

"At once?" he asked.

"It is so ordered," they replied.

"But I must see someone before I go," he protested.

"We will wait a few minutes," a soldier said, at your command."

"Let it not be longer, sir," another said. "The general does not like delay."

No, he would not, Martin knew, thinking of that firm young figure. He had turned away and at the door of the women's barracks he asked the girl soldier on guard for Siu-li, and was told to wait.

A MAN'S FOES

She came a few moments later and quickly he told her his orders.

"And you?" he asked.

"I am to go into training, merely," she said.

"And Meng-an?" he asked, wanting only to hear of her and knowing very well that he knew more than Siu-li did.

"I have not seen her," Siu-li replied.

He knew he should tell nothing he had been told and yet he wanted some communication with that small creature slipping her lonely way among the enemy. He said in a low voice, too low for the waiting guard to hear :

"If you see her today, tell her I said to take care for herself as she goes." And then when he saw the astonishment in Siu-li's eyes he added quickly, "She is more valuable than you know — to the cause, I mean."

But Siu-li was shrewd with the shrewdness of a woman.

"I was about to ask you now that we are here if you regret coming, but I think I need not," she said.

He laughed sheepishly, feeling himself grow red.

"No, you need not," he agreed. "I am not sorry."

Weeks passed him, and he spent them day upon day in searching the barren hills. They were not barren, he was beginning to discover. Under their sandy tawny surfaces there was rock and in the seams of the rock minerals. He walked up the steep beds of mountain streams, his eyes upon every glint and glitter. The men with him were well chosen, for they were men who belonged to the hills, who had spent their youth washing the streams for silver.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"But is there iron?" he asked them as he asked the hills themselves.

"That we don't know, for we never looked for it when there was silver," they said.

In their fashion they had mined some parts of the hills, and they led him to shallow pits they had dug. These he tapped and examined and tested the fragments he chose. There was silver everywhere, but he could not find iron.

"We may have to make our bullets of silver," he thought grimly.

The strange hills surrounded him, and silence was their atmosphere. There seemed no life in them, and yet sometimes he came upon a monastery built out of sandy rock and seeming in its shape and colour so like a cliff that only a gate told the difference. Inside the priests lived, silent so long that they could scarcely speak when he spoke, men whom the mountain winds had dried and beaten upon and bleached until they too were sand-coloured. And yet every one of them, when he told them his task, was eager to help him and to show him certain dark ledges they had seen. Every one of them knew that they had an enemy.

Everywhere they knew. In the night under the endlessly clear skies and beneath the sharp stars he thought of those who were farmers by day and soldiers by night, and he thought of priests who wanted no peace, and of his sister, who had been so tenderly reared, learning to march long hours and to fire a gun, and most of all and longest he thought of Meng-an making her lonely way in and out among the enemy.

A MAN'S FOES

"She has the hardest and most dangerous work of us all," he thought. When he thought of this his bitterness against his father heaped itself up with gall. "He betrays every one of us," he thought.

The filial piety he had been taught he put from him forever, that ancient teaching which had tied together the generations of his people.

"I am no more his son," he thought. And he thought, "We must build a new country, and every generation must be its own lawmaker."

"There is no iron," he told the general.

"There must be," the general said. "Go back."

The hills were bitterly cold now with autumn. The foolish silver was rich everywhere. But the hills held nothing more. He had stayed a month, and then the cold rain had driven him down from the summit. And then it had seemed he must make report of having found nothing. And he knew, too — the long silent nights and the hot noons had told him — that he longed to see Meng-an. Had she come and gone safely? He must know, or thought he must. And so he had come down. He had gone at once to Siu-li. But Siu-li was not there. She had been sent the day before with her regiment to a village to the east to make forays by night against an enemy garrison. He was sick with alarm when he heard it, and then dismayed because since she was gone there was no one he could ask of Meng-an. Everyone went about his business here, and it was no one's business to speak of Meng-an. And he had had to go then to the general.

"Go back," the general said now.

And against his look there was no hope of refusal. Besides how could he say, "I cannot, until I have seen a certain woman," and how could he even say, "I must hear first if Meng-an is safe"?

TODAY AND FOREVER

The general saw his hesitation. "We are still at war," he said. "Why do you delay?"

"I do not," Martin said doggedly.

He went back that same day.

He had lived in the hills so long now that when he thought of cities and of people they were words and nothing more. Had he once seen ships and trains and travelled upon them? Even his memories of them were gone. He had for companions these men as dogged as himself and for his strength his own determination that if there was iron in these hills he would find it. And if he had needed a spur to prod him he had it. One day when in an October as cold as winter where he was, he sat on a rock near a summit eating his bread and salt fish, at noon, he saw even there an airplane. It flew well above the mountain top and yet close enough for him to see it. It was an enemy plane! He could see its markings clearly above him as he looked up at it. It sank a little as though it saw him, then rose and sped on. An enemy plane over these far, inner mountains! He swallowed his food quickly and called his men. They were eating fifty feet below him in a shallow valley. He had climbed out of it to see the hills while he ate.

"Come on!" he cried, and when they were come he said, "We must make haste if the enemy has flown as far as this."

They had worked longer after that, and every day they searched the skies. There were no planes for ten days more, and then eleven planes flew over them like wild geese.

A MAN'S FOES

That was the day he found iron. He found it early in the morning, low, near the base of the peak upon which he had spent uselessly nearly fifteen days. He had gone too high. The iron was old, and aeons had driven the deposits deep into the bowels of the mountains.

"Have I been looking too high, everywhere?" he asked himself.

He was so excited by this possible thing that he went no higher. He covered half the base of the mountain by noon and in seven places he found signs of iron, whether it was seven different places or all one great rich vein he did not know. But when he sat down at noon, he ate his bread in such excitement that he could scarcely swallow.

Then it was he heard the planes, and looking up he saw their geeslike passage. The sight might only yesterday have filled him with despair. But today he shook his fist at them and with his mouth filled with bread he shouted :

"We have our bullets for you !"

Now he could go back with good news. He was even glad that he had found iron in autumn instead of spring. Soon it would be too cold for the enemy planes to fly over the inland, and during the winter months the mines could be planned and made ready. He had long talks about machinery with his men. When he thought of machinery for mines he was troubled. How could they construct and haul and place those great masses? But these men had been miners without such aid. Bamboo and ropes and wooden buckets were their utensils, and Martin listened to them. "A little more than they have had and it will be much," he thought as they went on.

TODAY AND FOREVER

Everywhere through the countryside there were signs of autumn. The harvests were good, and the farmers grew bold to reap them, because few airplanes came now to bomb.

"In the summer we spent half the day in our bomb-huts," they told Martin. "Well, it's cool there!" they said, grinning with mischief. "Well, we have had bandits of many kinds," another said. Wherever he went there was no talk of hardship or surrender, only of how work could be done, whether the enemy came or not.

"I wish my father could be here," he thought. "If he saw these people, could he still betray them?"

The thought of his father was like a sore in his heart. Whatever he did, he thought, it would not be enough to atone for his father. And when he thought of Meng-an he asked himself what right he had, the son of a traitor, to think of her.

In this mood he walked the miles back to the encampment and, without asking of his sister or Meng-an, he went, dusty as he was, to report to the general. In his hand he carried the fragments of rock and he laid them upon the table.

"I have found iron," he said simply, "and plenty of it." The news was enough of itself.

The general took up the rocks as though they were gold.

"Better than gold," he said. And then when he had examined them he looked up at Martin. "When can you go back?" he asked.

"Today, if you bid me," Martin replied steadily.

But the general laughed. "Now you are taught," he said. "It is the answer I wanted. But you shall not go today. We must make our plans."

A MAN'S FOES

"There is not much time before winter comes down," Martin said doggedly.

"Not much, but a day or two," the general said, "and that is long enough for everything. I have good news for you. Do you remember my little spy?"

"Meng-an?" Her name flew out of Martin's mouth like a bird from a cage.

The general nodded. "How did you know her name?" he asked, surprised.

"She brought my sister and me here," Martin said.

"Do you have a sister?" the general demanded of him. "And if you have, why did you not tell me?"

"There was no need," Martin said.

But the general struck a bell on his table. "She must come here, too," he said. "This news is for both of your father's children."

A soldier appeared.

"Go and fetch — what is her name?"

"Siu-li," Martin said. "Of the Third Regiment."

"Surname Liu, name Siu-li, of the Third Regiment," the general ordered. "And tell Meng-an to come also."

"So!" the soldier cried as he had been taught, and saluting he hurried away.

At the mention of his father Martin was afraid. What would the general call good news except that a traitor had been killed? If this was the news he must warn Siu-li first. They must show no grief. He thought quickly.

"Sir," he asked, "may I speak first with my sister? If something has befallen our father, it will be better to prepare her for it."

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Nothing has befallen him," the general replied. He was turning the fragments of rocks over in his hands, dreaming of the precious stuff they held.

So there was nothing to do except to wait.

"Sit down," the general said, and he sat down. It was very hard to wait. The general was looking at the rock now through a small hand microscope.

Then in a while they heard the light quick tread of feet trained to march, the feet of girl soldiers. The general put down his microscope and looked up. The door curtains opened. Two straight slender girls in uniform stood there. They saluted and stood at attention, Meng-an and Siu-li. Martin smiled at Siu-li and looked at Meng-an. His heart rose on a great wave of pride. These two girls in the old days would have been sheltered, helpless creatures behind a courtyard wall; Siu-li even a few months ago had been in her way useless.

"Is this your sister?" the general asked of Martin, but gazing at Siu-li.

"It is she," Martin said, rising to his feet.

"Be at ease, all of you," the general said. He seemed to have forgotten why he had called Meng-an here. "Be seated," he told Siu-li, without taking his eyes from her face. "I have not seen you before," he said.

Siu-li blushed a little. The uniform, her straight-cut hair, the pistol at her belt, her feet in hard leather shoes, none of these could hide what she was, a soft-eyed girl. Those large soft eyes she now turned upon the young general as full of coquetry as though she wore a silk robe and had jewels in her hair.

"I did not know you wished it," she said demurely.

A MAN'S FOES

"But I do," the general said.

Meng-an looked at Martin. In her eyes he saw that flickering — it was laughter, surely. He smiled to answer it. It was pleasant to communicate thus with her over those other two. Then Meng-an coughed a small dry cough, and the general glanced at her and remembered.

"Ah, you also," he said, but his voice was very different to her. "Yes, and now repeat what you told me. Who told you that the enemy is about to march southward and how we can surprise that march?"

"Wang Ting," Meng-an replied.

"Wang Ting!" Siu-li cried. "But he is my father's secretary!"

Meng-an did not turn her head. She continued to make report, her eyes upon the general's face. "He is sent by his master. Of himself he knows nothing, but his master is in a position to know much and will be as long as his life is spared by the enemy. If they find out he will die. But until that time, I go to a certain small tea shop and there I can be told."

All this Meng-an said in her even voice as though what she said was nothing.

"If I had known there was also you," the general said to Siu-li as though she were the only one in the room, "I would have told you at once what your father was. He has been for us since the city fell. Why do you think this little spy comes and goes except to bring me news from your father?"

Now Siu-li turned upon Meng-an. "And you did not tell me!"

"How did I know what you thought of your father?" Meng-an retorted. "And I have my orders against talk about him with anyone," she added.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"And you," the general said to Martin, "you I wanted to try, to see if you were fit to be your father's son. When you did not give up until you found the iron we need, I said, 'He is fit.'"

"You knew I doubted my father?" Martin asked slowly.

"Your father begged me in a letter to tell you what he was, when I saw the time was right," the general replied.

They sat, these impetuous two, the modern son and daughter of an old Confucian scholar, and humbled themselves in their knowledge. Then suddenly Siu-li began to weep. She turned to Martin.

"We — we were very unjust!" she whispered.

"Yes," Martin said in a daze, "yes, we were." He thought of his old father in the midst of the comings and goings of the enemy in his house, holding his life as lightly as a toy in his hands, and he cleared his throat. "I wish we could tell him so," he said.

"I will tell him," Meng-an said calmly.

"Don't cry!" the general said suddenly to Siu-li.

She looked at him, her great eyes dewy with tears and very beautiful.

"How can I help it?" she said piteously. "I have been a wicked daughter. I ought to have known my father couldn't — be what we thought he was!"

"I say you are not to weep any more!" the general shouted. "I cannot bear it," he added in a gentler voice.

And then Martin felt his own eyes caught by someone's gaze, and looked up, and there were Meng-an's eyes, holding his, and this time it was as though their hands clasped. And suddenly his heart inquired, "Is there any reason now?" and then answered itself, "There is no reason."

"Now this is all settled," the general said hastily, "and it is time we went back to our work." His eyes took leave of Siu-li's soft black ones, though unwillingly. "Let us proceed," he said sharply. "Soldiers, attention!"

Martin rose, Siu-li and Meng-an leaped to their feet, saluted, wheeled, and marched out.

The general stared after them and sighed. Then he smiled at Martin.

"You are in love with that little spy of mine," he said.

"How — who —?" Martin stammered.

"Ah, I saw it," the general said calmly. "Well, why not? Everything must go on the same in war-time. Well, you may have my little spy. Tell her so. But she must go on working. We must all go on working."

"Yes, sir," Martin said. He was dazed with the general's calmness over the most enormous thing in the world. Then even as he looked at the general he saw a strange thing happening. Over that firm stern young face he saw a soft sheepish smile appear that turned the general at once into an ordinary young man such as may be seen any spring day in any country.

"Your sister has very fine eyes," he said abruptly.

"They have been so considered," Martin replied.

The general looked startled. "I suppose so," he said unwillingly. He reflected a moment, still staring at Martin without seeing him.

"Why not?" he demanded after a moment.

"Why not, indeed?" Martin replied. "As you said, sir, even in war everything must go on as usual."

TODAY AND FOREVER

They looked at each other for the least part of a moment longer and suddenly they laughed, and then, sharing this laughter in their youth like a cup of wine between them, they laughed again for pure pleasure.

The Old Demon

OLD Mrs. Wang knew of course that there was a war. Everybody had known for a long time that there was war going on and that Japanese were killing Chinese. But still it was not real and no more than hearsay since none of the Wangs had been killed. The Village of Three Mile Wangs on the flat banks of the Yellow River, which was old Mrs. Wang's clan village, had never even seen a Japanese. This was how they came to be talking about Japanese at all.

It was evening and early summer, and after her supper Mrs. Wang had climbed the dike steps, as she did every day, to see how high the river had risen. She was much more afraid of the river than of the Japanese. She knew what the river would do. And one by one the villagers had followed her up the dike, and now they stood staring down at the malicious yellow water, curling along like a lot of snakes, and biting at the high dike banks.

"I never saw it as high as this so early," Mrs. Wang said. She sat down on a bamboo stool that her grandson, Little Pig, had brought for her, and spat into the water.

"It's worse than the Japanese, this old devil of a river," Little Pig said recklessly.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Fool!" Mrs. Wang said quickly. "The river god will hear you. Talk about something else."

So they had gone on talking about the Japanese. . . . How, for instance, asked Wang, the baker, who was old Mrs. Wang's nephew twice removed, would they know the Japanese when they saw them?

Mrs. Wang at this point said positively, "You'll know them. I once saw a foreigner. He was taller than the eaves of my house and he had mud-coloured hair and eyes the colour of a fish's eyes. Anyone who does not look like us — that is a Japanese."

Everybody listened to her since she was the oldest woman in the village and whatever she said settled something.

Then Little Pig spoke up in his disconcerting way. "You can't see them, Grandmother. They hide up in the sky in airplanes."

Mrs. Wang did not answer immediately. Once she would have said positively, "I shall not believe in an airplane until I see it." But so many things had been true which she had not believed — the Empress, for instance, whom she had not believed dead, was dead. The Republic, again, she had not believed in because she did not know what it was. She still did not know, but they had said for a long time there had been one. So now she merely stared quietly about the dike where they all sat around her. It was very pleasant and cool, and she felt nothing mattered if the river did not rise to flood.

"I don't believe in the Japanese," she said flatly.

They laughed at her a little, but no one spoke. Someone lit her pipe — it was Little Pig's wife, who was her favourite — and she smoked it.

"Sing, Little Pig!" someone called.

So Little Pig began to sing an old song in a high

THE OLD DEMON

quavering voice, and old Mrs. Wang listened and forgot the Japanese. The evening was beautiful, the sky so clear and still that the willows overhanging the dike were reflected even in the muddy water. Everything was at peace. The thirty-odd houses which made up the village straggled along beneath them. Nothing could break this peace. After all, the Japanese were only human beings.

"I doubt those airplanes," she said mildly to Little Pig when he stopped singing.

But without answering her, he went on to another song.

Year in and year out she had spent the summer evenings like this on the dike. The first time she was seventeen and a bride, and her husband had shouted to her to come out of the house and up the dike, and she had come, blushing and twisting her hands together, to hide among the women while the men roared at her and made jokes about her. All the same, they had liked her. "A pretty piece of meat in your bowl," they had said to her husband. "Feet a trifle big," he had answered deprecatingly. But she could see he was pleased, and so gradually her shyness went away.

He, poor man, had been drowned in a flood when he was still young. And it had taken her years to get him prayed out of Buddhist purgatory. Finally she had grown tired of it, what with the child and the land all on her back, and so when the priest said coaxingly, "Another ten pieces of silver and he'll be out entirely," she asked, "What's he got in there yet?"

"Only his right hand," the priest said, encouraging her.

Well, then, her patience broke. Ten dollars! It would feed them for the winter. Besides, she had had to hire labour for her share of repairing the dike, too, so there would be no more floods.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"If it's only one hand, he can pull himself out," she said firmly.

She often wondered if he had, poor silly fellow. As like as not, she had often thought gloomily in the night, he was still lying there, waiting for her to do something about it. That was the sort of man he was. Well, some day, perhaps, when Little Pig's wife had had the first baby safely and she had a little extra, she might go back to finish him out of purgatory. There was no real hurry though. . . .

"Grandmother, you must go in," Little Pig's wife's soft voice said. "There is a mist rising from the river now that the sun is gone."

"Yes, I suppose I must," old Mrs. Wang agreed. She gazed at the river a moment. That river — it was full of good and evil together. It would water the fields when it was curbed and checked, but then if an inch were allowed it, it crashed through like a roaring dragon. That was how her husband had been swept away — careless, he was, about his bit of the dike. He was always going to mend it, always going to pile more earth on top of it, and then in a night the river rose and broke through. He had run out of the house, and she had climbed on the roof with the child and had saved herself and it while he was drowned. Well, they had pushed the river back again behind its dikes, and it had stayed there this time. Every day she herself walked up and down the length of the dike for which the village was responsible and examined it. The men laughed and said, "If anything is wrong with the dikes, Granny will tell us."

THE OLD DEMON

It had never occurred to any of them to move the village away from the river. The Wangs had lived there for generations, and some had always escaped the floods and had fought the river more fiercely than ever afterward.

Little Pig suddenly stopped singing.

"The moon is coming up!" he cried. "That's not good. Airplanes come out on moonlight nights."

"Where do you learn all this about airplanes?" old Mrs. Wang exclaimed. "It is tiresome to me," she added, so severely that no one spoke. In this silence, leaning upon the arm of Little Pig's wife, she descended slowly the earthen steps which led down into the village, using her long pipe in the other hand as a walking-stick. Behind her the villagers came down, one by one, to bed. No one moved before she did, but none stayed long after her.

And in her own bed at last, behind the blue cotton mosquito curtains which Little Pig's wife fastened securely, she fell peacefully asleep. She had lain awake a little while thinking about the Japanese and wondering why they wanted to fight. Only very coarse persons wanted wars. In her mind she saw large coarse persons. If they came one must wheedle them, she thought, invite them to drink tea, and explain to them, reasonably — only why should they come to a peaceful farming village . . . ?

So she was not in the least prepared for Little Pig's wife screaming at her that the Japanese had come. She sat up in bed muttering, "The tea-bowls — the tea——"

"Grandmother, there's no time!" Little Pig's wife screamed. "They're here — they're here!"

"Where?" old Mrs. Wang cried, now awake.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"In the sky!" Little Pig's wife wailed.

They had all run out at that, into the clear early dawn, and gazed up. There, like wild geese flying in autumn, were great birdlike shapes.

"But what are they?" old Mrs. Wang cried.

And then, like a silver egg dropping, something drifted straight down and fell at the far end of the village in a field. A fountain of earth flew up, and they all ran to see it. There was a hole thirty feet across, as big as a pond. They were so astonished they could not speak, and then, before anyone could say anything, another and another egg began to fall and everybody was running, running . . .

Everybody, that is, but Mrs. Wang. When Little Pig's wife seized her hand to drag her along, old Mrs. Wang pulled away and sat down against the bank of the dike.

"I can't run," she remarked. "I haven't run in seventy years, since before my feet were bound. You go on. Where's Little Pig?" She looked around. Little Pig was already gone. "Like his grandfather," she remarked, "always the first to run."

But Little Pig's wife would not leave her, not, that is, until old Mrs. Wang reminded her that it was her duty.

"If Little Pig is dead," she said, "then it is necessary that his son be born alive." And when the girl still hesitated, she struck at her gently with her pipe. "Go on — go on," she exclaimed.

So unwillingly, because now they could scarcely hear each other speak for the roar of the dipping planes, Little Pig's wife went on with the others.

By now, although only a few minutes had passed, the village was in ruins and the straw roofs and wooden beams were blazing. Everybody was gone. As they passed they had shrieked at old Mrs. Wang to come on, and she had called back pleasantly :

THE OLD DEMON

“ I'm coming — I'm coming ! ”

But she did not go. She sat quite alone watching now what was an extraordinary spectacle. For soon other planes came, from where she did not know, but they attacked the first ones. The sun came up over the fields of ripening wheat, and in the clear summery air the planes wheeled and darted and spat at each other. When this was over, she thought, she would go back into the village and see if anything was left. Here and there a wall stood, supporting a roof. She could not see her own house from here. But she was not unused to war. Once bandits had looted their village, and houses had been burned then, too. Well, now it had happened again. Burning houses one could see often, but not this darting silvery shining battle in the air. She understood none of it — not what those things were, nor how they stayed up in the sky. She simply sat, growing hungry, and watching.

“ I'd like to see one close,” she said aloud. And at that moment, as though in answer, one of them pointed suddenly downward, and, wheeling and twisting as though it were wounded, it fell head down in a field which Little Pig had ploughed only yesterday for soy-beans. And in an instant the sky was empty again, and there was only this wounded thing on the ground and herself.

She hoisted herself carefully from the earth. At her age she need be afraid of nothing. She could, she decided, go and see what it was. So, leaning on her bamboo pipe, she made her way slowly across the fields. Behind her in the sudden stillness two or three village dogs appeared and followed, creeping close to her in their terror. When they drew near to the fallen plane, they barked furiously. Then she hit them with her pipe.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Be quiet," she scolded, "there's already been noise enough to split my ears!"

She tapped the airplane.

"Metal," she told the dogs. "Silver, doubtless," she added. Melted up, it would make them all rich.

She walked around it, examining it closely. What made it fly? It seemed dead. Nothing moved or made a sound within. Then, coming to the side to which it tipped, she saw a young man in it, slumped into a heap in a little seat. The dogs growled, but she struck at them again and they fell back.

"Are you dead?" she inquired politely.

The young man moved a little at her voice, but did not speak. She drew nearer and peered into the hole in which he sat. His side was bleeding.

"Wounded!" she exclaimed. She took his wrist. It was warm, but inert, and when she let it go, it dropped against the side of the hole. She stared at him. He had black hair and a dark skin like a Chinese and still he did not look like a Chinese.

"He must be a Southerner," she thought. Well, the chief thing was, he was alive.

"You had better come out," she remarked. "I'll put some herb plaster on your side."

The young man muttered something dully.

"What did you say?" she asked. But he did not say it again.

"I am still quite strong," she decided after a moment. So she reached in and seized him about the waist and pulled him out slowly, panting a good deal.

THE OLD DEMON

Fortunately he was rather a little fellow and very light. When she had him on the ground, he seemed to find his feet ; and he stood shakily and clung to her, and she held him up.

"Now if you can walk to my house," she said, "I'll see if it is there."

Then he said something, quite clearly. She listened and could not understand a word of it. She pulled away from him and stared.

"What's that ?" she asked.

He pointed at the dogs. They were standing growling, their ruffs up. Then he spoke again, and as he spoke he crumpled to the ground. The dogs fell on him, so that she had to beat them off with her hands.

"Get away !" she shouted. "Who told you to kill him ?"

And then, when they had slunk back, she heaved him somehow on to her back ; and, trembling, half carrying, half pulling him, she dragged him to the ruined village and laid him in the street while she went to find her house, taking the dogs with her.

Her house was quite gone. She found the place easily enough. This was where it should be, opposite the water-gate into the dike. She had always watched that gate herself. Miraculously it was not injured now, nor was the dike broken. It would be easy enough to rebuild the house. Only, for the present, it was gone.

So she went back to the young man. He was lying as she had left him, propped against the dike, panting and very pale. He had opened his coat and he had a little bag from which he was taking out strips of cloth and a bottle of something. And again he spoke, and again she understood nothing. Then he made signs and she saw it was water he wanted, so she took up a broken pot from one of many blown about the street, and, going up the dike, she filled it with river water and brought it down again and washed his wound, and she tore off the strips he made from the rolls of bandaging. He knew how to put the cloth over the gaping wound and he made signs to her, and she followed these signs. All the time he was trying to tell her something, but she could understand nothing.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"You must be from the South, sir," she said. It was easy to see that he had education. He looked very clever. "I have heard your language is different from ours." She laughed a little to put him at his ease, but he only stared at her sombrely with dull eyes. So she said brightly, "Now if I could find something for us to eat, it would be nice."

He did not answer. Indeed he lay back, panting still more heavily, and stared into space as though she had not spoken.

"You would be better with food," she went on. "And so would I," she added. She was beginning to feel unbearably hungry.

It occurred to her that in Wang the baker's shop there might be some bread. Even if it were dusty with fallen mortar, it would still be bread. She would go and see. But before she went she moved the soldier a little so that he lay in the edge of shadow cast by a willow tree that grew in the bank of the dike. Then she went to the baker's shop. The dogs were gone.

The baker's shop was, like everything else, in ruins. No one was there. At first she saw nothing but the mass of crumpled earthen walls. But then she remembered that the oven was just inside the door, and the door-frame still stood erect, supporting one end of the roof. She stood in this frame, and, running her hand in underneath the fallen roof inside, she felt the wooden cover of the iron cauldron. Under this there might be steamed bread. She worked her arm delicately and carefully in. It took quite a long time, but, even so, clouds of lime and dust almost choked her. Nevertheless she was right. She squeezed her hand under the cover and felt the firm smooth skin of the big steamed bread rolls, and one by one she drew out four.

THE OLD DEMON

"It's hard to kill an old thing like me," she remarked cheerfully to no one, and she began to eat one of the rolls as she walked back. If she had a bit of garlic and a bowl of tea — but one couldn't have everything in these times.

It was at this moment that she heard voices. When she came in sight of the soldier, she saw surrounding him a crowd of other soldiers, who had apparently come from nowhere. They were staring down at the wounded soldier, whose eyes were now closed.

"Where did you get this Japanese, Old Mother?" they shouted at her.

"What Japanese?" she asked, coming to them.

"This one!" they shouted.

"Is he a Japanese?" she cried in the greatest astonishment. "But he looks like us — his eyes are black, his skin——"

"Japanese!" one of them shouted at her.

"Well," she said quietly, "he dropped out of the sky."

"Give me that bread!" another shouted.

"Take it," she said, "all except this one for him."

TODAY AND FOREVER

"A Japanese monkey eat good bread?" the soldier shouted.

"I suppose he is hungry also," old Mrs. Wang replied. She began to dislike these men. But then, she had always disliked soldiers.

"I wish you would go away," she said. "What are you doing here? Our village has always been peaceful."

"It certainly looks very peaceful now," one of the men said, grinning, "as peaceful as a grave. Do you know who did that, Old Mother? The Japanese!"

"I suppose so," she agreed. Then she asked, "Why? That's what I don't understand."

"Why? Because they want our land, that's why!"

"Our land!" she repeated. "Why, they can't have our land!"

"Never!" they shouted.

But all this time while they were talking and chewing the bread they had divided among themselves, they were watching the eastern horizon.

"Why do you keep looking east?" old Mrs. Wang now asked.

"The Japanese are coming from there," the man replied who had taken the bread.

"Are you running away from them?" she asked, surprised.

"There are only a handful of us," he said apologetically. "We were left to guard a village—Pao An, in the county of——"

"I know that village," old Mrs. Wang interrupted. "You needn't tell me. I was a girl there. How is the old Pao who keeps the tea shop in the main street? He's my brother."

"Everybody is dead there," the man replied.

THE OLD DEMON

"The Japanese have taken it — a great army of men came with their foreign guns and tanks, so what could we do?"

"Of course, only run," she agreed. Nevertheless she felt dazed and sick. So he was dead, that one brother she had left! She was now the last of her father's family.

But the soldiers were straggling away again, leaving her alone.

"They'll be coming, those little black dwarfs," they were saying. "We'd best go on."

Nevertheless, one lingered a moment, the one who had taken the bread, to stare down at the young wounded man, who lay with his eyes shut, not having moved at all.

"Is he dead?" he inquired. Then, before Mrs. Wang could answer, he pulled a short knife out of his belt. "Dead or not, I'll give him a punch or two with this——"

But old Mrs. Wang pushed his arm away.

"No, you won't," she said with authority. "If he is dead, then there is no use in sending him into purgatory all in pieces. I am a good Buddhist myself."

The man laughed. "Oh, well, he is dead," he answered; and then, seeing his comrades already at a distance, he ran after them.

A Japanese, was he? Old Mrs. Wang, left alone with this inert figure, looked at him tentatively. He was very young, she could see, now that his eyes were closed. His hand, limp in unconsciousness, looked like a boy's hand, unformed and still growing. She felt his wrist but could discern no pulse. She leaned over him and held to his lips the half of her roll which she had not eaten.

TODAY AND FOREVER

"Eat," she said very loudly and distinctly. "Bread!"

But there was no answer. Evidently he was dead. He must have died while she was getting the bread out of the oven.

There was nothing to do then but to finish the bread herself. And when that was done, she wondered if she ought not to follow after Little Pig and his wife and all the villagers. The sun was mounting and it was growing hot. If she were going, she had better go. But first she would climb the dike and see what the direction was. They had gone straight west, and as far as eye could look westward was a great plain. She might even see a good-sized crowd miles away. Anyway, she could see the next village, and they might all be there.

So she climbed the dike slowly, getting very hot. There was a slight breeze on top of the dike and it felt good. She was shocked to see the river very near the top of the dike. Why, it had risen in the last hour!

"You old demon!" she said severely. Let the river god hear it if he liked. He was evil, that he was — so to threaten flood when there had been all this other trouble.

She stooped and bathed her cheeks and her wrists. The water was quite cold, as though with fresh rains somewhere. Then she stood up and gazed around her. To the west there was nothing except in the far distance the soldiers still half-running, and beyond them the blur of the next village, which stood on a long rise of ground. She had better set out for that village. Doubtless Little Pig and his wife were there waiting for her.

Just as she was about to climb down and start out, she saw something on the eastern horizon. It was at first only an immense cloud of dust. But, as she stared at it, very quickly it became a lot of black dots and shining spots. Then she saw what it was. It was a lot of men — an army. Instantly she knew what army.

THE OLD DEMON

"That's the Japanese," she thought. Yes, above them were the buzzing silver planes. They circled about, seeming to search for someone.

"I don't know who you're looking for," she muttered, "unless it's me and Little Pig and his wife. We're the only ones left. You've already killed my brother Pao."

She had almost forgotten that Pao was dead. Now she remembered it acutely. He had such a nice shop — always clean, and the tea good and the best meat dumplings to be had and the price always the same. Pao was a good man. Besides, what about his wife and his seven children? Doubtless they were all killed, too. Now these Japanese were looking for her. It occurred to her that on the dike she could easily be seen. So she clambered hastily down.

It was when she was about half-way down that she thought of the water-gate. This old river — it had been a curse to them since time began. Why should it not make up a little now for all the wickedness it had done? It was plotting wickedness again, trying to steal over its banks. Well, why not? She wavered a moment. It was a pity, of course, that the young dead Japanese would be swept into the flood. He was a nice-looking boy, and she had saved him from being stabbed. It was not quite the same as saving his life, of course, but still it was a little the same. If he had been alive, he would have been saved. She went over to him and tugged at him until he lay well near the top of the bank. Then she went down again.

TODAY AND FOREVER

She knew perfectly how to open the water-gate. Any child knew how to open the sluice for crops. But she knew also how to swing open the whole gate. The question was, could she open it quickly enough to get out of the way?

"I'm only one old woman," she muttered. She hesitated a second more. Well, it would be a pity not to see what sort of a baby Little Pig's wife would have, but one could not see everything. She had seen a great deal in this life. There was an end to what one could see, anyway.

She glanced again to the east. There were the Japanese coming across the plain. They were a long clear line of black, dotted with thousands of glittering points. If she opened this gate, the impetuous water would roar toward them, rushing into the plains, rolling into a wide lake, drowning them, maybe. Certainly they could not keep on marching nearer and nearer to her and to Little Pig and his wife who were waiting for her. Well, Little Pig and his wife — they would wonder about her — but they would never dream of this. It would make a good story — she would have enjoyed telling it.

She turned resolutely to the gate. Well, some people fought with airplanes and some with guns, but you could fight with a river, too, if it were a wicked one like this one. She wrenched out a huge wooden pin. It was slippery with silvery green moss. The rill of water burst into a strong jet. When she wrenched one more pin, the rest would give way themselves. She began pulling at it, and felt it slip a little from its hole.

THE OLD DEMON

"I might be able to get myself out of purgatory with this," she thought, "and maybe they'll let me have that old man of mine, too. What's a hand or his to all this? Then we'll——"

The pin slipped away suddenly, and the gate burst flat against her and knocked her breath away. She had only time to gasp, to the river :

"Come on, you old demon !"

Then she felt it seize her and lift her up to the sky. It was beneath her and around her. It rolled her joyfully hither and thither, and then, holding her close and enfolded, it went rushing against the enemy.

THE END

